The due-process clause could not make immutable the rules of State courts, adopted by Federal courts, to any such extent that it ousts the power of Congress to reexamine the reason for its adoption, and to reject it if found contrary to the actualities of industrial life.

But in the words of Mr. Justice Moody (Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U. S., 101): "It does not follow, however, that a procedure settled in English law at the time of the emigration and brought to this country and practiced by our ancestors is an essential element of due process of law. If that were so, the procedure of the first half of the seventeenth century would be fastened upon American jurisprudence like a straitjacket, only to be unloosened by constitutional amendment.

"That," said Mr. Justice Mathews, in the Hurtado case (110 U. S., 516, 529), "would be to deny every quality of the law but its age, and to render it incapable of progress or improvement."

The judicial power of adopting the standard of care, evolved 50 years after the adoption of the fifth amendment, can be no greater than the legislative power of Congress to reject it if found inharmonious with national well-being.

The Supreme Court has shown a harmonious and consistent desire to approve well-considered changes in procedure affecting Federal needs, (Oceanic Co. case, 214 U. S., 320.) There is an apparent exception in the New York Bakers' case (Lochner v. N. Y., 198 U. S., 45), but this is overcome by the decisions in the Oregon Laundry case (Muller v. Oregon, 208 U. S., 412) and the Tennessee Coal Miners' case (183 U. S., 13), and more directly in the Oceanic case (cited above), where Federal power of regulation of excluding aliens and enforcing it by what the steamship company claimed was violation of due process of law, was upheld.

In Juilliard v. Greenman it was said: "A constitution establishing a frame of government, declaring fundamental principles, and creating a national sovereignty, and intended to endure for ages and to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs, is not to be interpreted with the strictness of a private contract. (110 U. S., 421, 1883.)"

In Noble State Bank v. Haskell (219 U. S., 104), Holmes, J., said: "In answering that question we must be cautious about pressing the broad words of the fourteenth amendment to a dryly logical extreme. Many laws, which it would be vain to ask the court to overthrow, could be shown easily enough to transgress a scholastic interpretation of one or another of the great guaranties of the Bill of Rights. They more or less limit the liberty of the individual or they diminish property to a certain extent. We have few certain criteria of legislation, and as it often is difficult to mark the line where what is called the police power of the States is limited by the Constitution of the United States, judges should be slow to read into the latter a nolumus mutare as against the lawmaker."

The Supreme Court of the United States on May 18, 1908, handed down its decision in St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co. v. May Taylor, as administratrix of George W. Taylor (210 U. S., 24, 281).

The case had been tried twice in the State courts, and eight years after Taylor's death the Supreme Court reversed the judgment obtained against the carrier; but the court laid down in its opinion a salutary rule, which is applicable to the principle of my compensation bill—H. R. 9831. Here is what the court said in that case which, with Holden v. Hardy (169 U. S., 366), gives my bill H. R. 9831 its constitutional justification:

"In deciding the questions thus raised, upon which the courts have differed (158 Fed., 931), we need not enter into the wilderness of cases upon the common-law duty of the employer to use a reasonable care to furnish his employee reasonably safe tools, machinery, and appliances, or consider when and how far that duty may be performed by delegating it to suitable persons for whose default the employer is not responsible. In the case before us the liability of the defendant does not grow out of the common-law duty of master to servant. The Congress, not satisfied with the common-law duty and its resulting liability, has prescribed and defined the duty by statute. We have nothing to do but to ascertain and declare the meaning of a few simple words in which the duty is described. It is enacted that "no cars, either loaded or unloaded, shall be used in interstate traffic which do not comply with the standard." There is no escape from the meaning of these words. Explanation can not clarify them and ought not to be employed to confuse them or lessen their significance. The obvious purpose of the legislature was to supplant the qualified duty of the common law with an absolute duty deemed by it more just. If the railroad does, in point of fact, use cars which do not comply with the standard, it violates the plain prohibitions of the law, and there arises from that violation the liability to make compensation to one who is injured by it. It is urged that this is a harsh construction.

"To this we reply that, if it be the true construction, its harshness is no concern of the courts. They have no responsibility for the justice or wisdom of legislation, and no duty except to enforce the law as it is written, unless it is clearly beyond the constitutional power of the lawmaking body. It is said that the liability under the statute, as thus construed, imposes so great a hardship upon the railroads that it ought not to be supposed that Congress intended it. Certainly the statute ought not to be given an absurd or utterly unreasonable interpretation leading to hardship and injustice, if any other interpretation is reasonably possible. But this argument is a dangerous one, and never should be heeded where the hardship would be occasional and exceptional. It would be better, it was once said by Lord Eldon, to look hardship in the face rather than break down the rules of law. But when applied to the case at bar the argument of hardship is plausible only when the attention is directed to the material interest of the employer to the exclusion of the interests of the employee and of the public. Where an injury happens through the absence of a safe drawbar there must be hardship. Such an injury must be an irreparable misfortune to some one. If it must be borne entirely by him who suffers it, that is a hardship to him. If its burden is transferred, as far as it is capable of transfer, to the employer, it is a hardship to him. It is quite conceivable that Congress, contemplating the inevitable hardship of such injuries, and hoping to diminish the economic loss to the community resulting from them, should deem it wise to impose their burdens upon those who could measurably control their causes, instead of upon those who are in the main helpless in that regard. Such a policy would be intelligible, and, to say the least, not so unreasonable as to require us to doubt that it was intended and to seek some unnatural interpretation of common words. We see no error in this part of the case." * * *

This opinion has been reaffirmed on May 15, 1911, in Ch., B. & Q. Ry. Co. v. U. S., per Harlan, J. (220 U. S., 559).

In Butler v. Frazee (211 U. S., at p. 466) Mr. Justice Moody said:

"The rule of assumption of risk has been thought by many a hard one when applied to the complicated conditions of modern industry, so largely conducted by the aid of machinery propelled by irresistible and merciless mechanical power, and the criticism frequently has been made that the imperative need of employment leaves to the workman no real freedom of choice, such as the rule assumes. That these considerations have had an influence is shown by the notorious unwillingness of juries to apply the rule and by the legislative modifications of it, which, from time to time, have been made, as, for instance, by Congress in the safety-appliance law." (Schlemmer v. B. R. & P. R. Co., 205 U. S., 1.)

So that we have a line of judicial thought not opposed to the exclusion of standards derived from the State judiciary. There must be some standards, not objectionable to the due process of law clause, which can be set up by Congress when liability based on an impossible standard is set aside as no longer of use in Federal legislation.

This standard may be established by Congress by the adoption of the rules basing on professional risk or hazard inhering in certain occupations, and excluding all other standards for the measuring of liability save only fraud.

The power of Congress, on grounds of public policy, to adopt as a standard the inclusion, admission, and presentation of questions of professional risk, is as great as was that of the courts of borrowing from State courts that of negligence, fellow service, and assumption of risk, etc., which on final analysis base on what Lord Abinger thought "convenient." The attitude of Congress toward this question of professional risk may be said to represent the "prevailing morality or strong and preponderating opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary for the public welfare." (Noble Bank case, 219 U. S., 104.)

Professional risk takes into account everyday facts recognized and acted on by millions of men at risk, on whose behalf this legislation seeks recognition at the hands of the courts. It bases on a power as intensive, though not as extensive, as is the police power of the States. So that whatever is found in the reports on the fourteenth amendment in upholding State power may be urged in support of the commerce power when questioned under the fifth amendment. The Noble Bank case permitted legislation to stand because "an ulterior public advantage may justify a comparatively insignificant taking of private property for what in its immediate purpose is a private use."

A Federal compensation act allowing the carriers to shift the cost of its operation on the public service and the consumers in no manner even attempted to reduce the earnings of the carriers. It merely adjusts by public intervention a state of affairs that has become a national scandal, benefiting in the last instance not even those who resist the progress of human interrelations in complex modern industrial affairs.

"The principles of the common law" are the standard of what is due process of law. (Hurtado v. Cal., 110 U. S., 516.) The law of deodands was and has been common law, save where changed by statute, since Angevin justices in eyre condemned wagon and oxen for the accidental death of a freeman and amerced against either the late owner or the hundred for fiscal dues. The lawyers of 1791 could have intended to preserve remedies based on the application of that law, while the rule of the Priestley case or that of the Farwell case could not have been in their minds.

Federal courts have in criminal cases refused to subdivide the property committing a violation against the Elkins Act and have held the trainload as the unit of violation. (Standard Oil Co. case, 164 Fed., 376.) Congress could then, by following the reasoning of the courts and without violating the fifth amendment, declare subject to condemnation and public sale the trainload of freight killing any human being while used on a Federal highway and could apply proceedings in rem against the guilty thing itself for its violation of the peace of the United States declared to exist in Re Neagle (135 U. S., 1). Such a proceeding for forfeiture would be due process of law, and the proceedings from such sale could be turned into the Treasury directly or paid over to the injured person's representatives. The railroad company would have no cause of complaint. (Humes case, 115 U. S., 512.) All this could be done by resorting to methods of law only a trifle more archaic than that flowing from the consequences of the Priestley and the Farwell cases, and no one could say that it would not be due process of law. Then it would seem to follow that any less qualified degree of absolute liability, based on this theory, would, in the last instance, be due process of law. But in addition hereto my bill, annexed hereto—H. R. 9813—permits, from a superabundance of caution, a hearing before the Federal courts on all pertinent questions, so that, it is submitted, no violation of due process can be found in such a bill.

STATUS.

Due process of law as applied to the regulation of public service admits of different treatment than does that of purely private service. (Harlan, J., in Atkins v. Kansas, 191 U. S., 207.)

The mere fact that the corporation is created by a State does not affect the question, since under Hale v. Henkel (201 U. S., 43) in respect of its Federal work it is as much subject to Federal legislation as though it had been chartered by the United States; nor are its property rights, only incidentally affected as we shall see, of such a paramount character as to subordinate its public character of a carrier engaging voluntarily in interstate commerce to its private rights of earning dividends at all costs. By submitting to Federal regulation, under the Hale v. Henkel case (201 U. S., 43), its property is affected with a Federal use, and the quantum of Federal imposition for a public purpose becomes a matter of bargain and of sale with the United States, not a constitutional right to exemption. But in addition thereto the United States may protect their peace, established under the doctrine of Re Neagle (135 U. S., 1), and may require the carrier or its property causing deaths and injuries to stand amercements as old as the Norman and Angevin laws, and thus due process of law, if our reasoning above is valid. But as the corporation is subject to Federal power of control, so are its servants public servants. Whenever the courts have found occasion to regulate the activities of railroad men, it was based on the recognition of their public service and their duties to the public, the ultimate beneficiaries in their social activities. Although engaged and paid by private State corporations, the activities of the men were held subject to the regulations of the courts, flowing from the judicial power. So that, even without statutory declaration, their work would be regarded as public service. And if it is public service, made so by the act of Congress, it is within the power of that body to annex thereto such conditions as seem reasonable to Congress. It may then shift as far as is feasible—shift the economic loss—from the men to the corporation, in the memorable words of Moody, J., in the Taylor case, set forth above.

But there is another phase to the relation of these workmen to their masters which may be properly covered by such a compensation act without violating due process of law. The exclusion of relevant factors of testimony heretofore has made for diminution of their status. By reason of maintaining a fiction, evidence of the actual conditions of railroad hazards were excluded; for it is a cruel fiction to maintain as a standard of care for railroading such care as the reasonable, prudent man, a meticulous, cowardly person uses. It is as though grain in an elevator were to be measured by areas or land measures because it originally came from the land, or as though opposition to the use of the bushel or cubic liters were resisted because the Normans measured land by the team's work. The exclusion of evidence of actual danger, the suppression of necessary evidentiary facts enforced a diminished status quite as effectively as though a political disqualification had been enforced after the railway men's evidence, such as preferring that of native-born Americans over those naturalized or aliens. The latter disqualification could have been removed by Congress. The candid mind should be reluctant to admit that the identical results can not be arrived at by due process under the compensation act; for in each case the aim of Congress would be to restore to these workers that measure of equality before the law enjoyed by all who are not servants.

Examination and analysis of the statistics of railways demonstrate that no part of railway men's wages is paid for danger or for the risk inherent in the service. Every cent for increased wages means increased tonnage moved with heavier trains under such exacting hours of service that Congress intervened. This act was sustained by the Supreme Court in Baltimore & Ohio Railroad v. Interstate Commerce Commission, May 29, 1911, Mr. Justice Hughes delivering the opinion.

Since then demonstration has been made that the logic, the economic, and the sociologic doctrines of the Farwell case and all its ramifications are untenable, and that the State courts erred in adopting it, the legal disadvantage of the servants under Federal jurisdictions is manifest, if Congress can not reform the debased status of laboring men and place them on economic equality with all others, at least before Federal courts. The workmen are not given absolute equality with the rest of the community under a compensation act. Such an act merely diminishes economic and legal disability they now suffer. It temporizes with a great principle in order to afford just and prompt, even if inadequate, compensation, and that is not violating due process of law.

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

Nevertheless the above, it may be urged, merely loads the laborer with new disabilities while claiming to enlarge his status. These disabilities may become as onerous as those he is struggling against. Compensation acts do not confer on him identical rights with those enjoyed by the passenger. Absolute liability to pay damages is tending to become the self-imposed rule for settling losses in the case of any railway company having a decent financial standing. This right is not sought to be conferred on the railway employee, and, therefore, these servants are worse off under a compensation act than under the employers' liability act where unlimited damages may be recovered. Besides this such a compensation act bars the employee of his common-law right to a jury trial guaranteed by the Constitution.

To these and to untold similar arguments to those who oppose compensation acts two answers may be made; first, that if no one should be permitted to adjudge one's own claim, still less should they who urge liberty of contract for the workmen be his economic opponents when by his injuries his service relation with them have ceased; and, second, to quote Brown, J., in Holden v. Hardy (169 U. S., p. 387), where it is said:

"They are mentioned only for the purpose of calling attention to the probability that other changes of no less importance may be made in the future, and that while the cardinal principles of justice are immutable, the methods by which justice is administered are subject to constant fluctuation, and that the Constitution of the United States, which is necessarily and to a large extent inflexible and exceedingly difficult of amendment, should not be so construed as to deprive the States of the power to so amend their laws as to make them conform to the wishes of the citizens as they may deem best for the public welfare, without bringing them into conflict with the supreme law of the land.

"Of course it is impossible to forecast the character or extent of these changes, but in view of the fact that from the day Magna Charta was signed to the present moment amendments to the structure of the law have been made with increasing frequency, it is impossible to suppose that they will not continue, and the law be forced to adapt itself to new conditions of society, and particularly to the new relations between employers and employees, as they arise. And, on page 397, the court again said: The legislature has also recognized the fact, which the experience of legislators in many States has corroborated, that the proprietors of these establishments and their operatives do not stand upon an equality, and that their interests are to a certain extent conflicting. The former naturally desire to obtain as much labor as possible from their employees, while the latter are often induced by the fear of discharge to conform to regulations which their judgment, fairly exercised, would pronounce to be detrimental to their health or strength. In other words, the proprietors lay down the rules and the laborers are practically constrained to obey them. In such cases self-interest is often an unsafe guide, and the legislature may promptly interpose its authority.

"It may not be proper to suggest in this connection that although the prosecution in this case was against the employer of labor, who apparently under the statute is the only one liable, his defense is not so much that his right to contract has been infringed upon but that the act works as a peculiar hardship to his employees, whose right to labor as long as they please is alleged to be thereby violated. The argument would certainly come with better grace and greater cogency from the latter class. But the fact that both parties are of full age and competent to contract does not necessarily deprive the State of the power to interfere where the parties do not stand upon an equality or where the public health demands that one party to the contract shall be protected against himself. The State still retains an interest in his welfare, however reckless he may be. The whole is no greater than the sum of all the parts, and when the individual health, safety, and welfare are sacrificed or neglected the State must suffer."

The other phase of liberty of contract, viz, that arising between the corporation, as master, and the United States, in enforcing such a compensation act is more specious than difficult.

Even if in the premises we have shown the basis of Federal power for legislatively bringing about a change of status of the servant, by overturning the rule of excluding evidence of inherent danger, and by basing the new status on the reformed rule, there still remains to consider the question of regulating that liberty of contract alleged to be safeguarded by the fifth amendment.

The Supreme Court, however, looks at substance. It can be demonstrated that none but corporations are the masters of railway servant. (Although we had started by discussing the general features of a compensation act for the purpose of the brief the discussion would be limited to the employees of railroads solely engaged in interstate commerce or subject to the Federal power while at work and injured on a Federal highway.) Corporations are not endowed with a capacity to contract themselves or their acts beyond the pale of the law, but are subject, on the contrary, to regulation by law in cases where an individual might be heard on the academic rights of freedom of contract. In response to such an argument the opinion by Lurton, J., in Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co. v. Riverside Mills (219 U. S., 186), is in point:

"It is obvious, from the many decisions of this court, that there is no such thing as absolute freedom of contract. Contracts which contravene public policy can not be lawfully made at all; and the power to make contracts may in all cases be regulated as to form, evidence, and validity as to third persons. The power of government extends to the denial of liberty of contract to the extent of forbidding or regulating every contract which is reasonably calculated to injuriously affect the public interests. Undoubtedly the United States is a government of limited and delegated powers, but in respect to those powers which have been expressly delegated, the power to regulate commerce between the States being one of them, the power is absolute, except as limited by other provisions of the Constitution itself.

"Having the express power to make rules for the conduct of commerce among the States, the range of congressional discretion as to the regulation best adapted to remedy a practice found inefficient or hurtful is a wide one. If the regulating act be one directly applicable to such commerce, not obnoxious to any other provision of the Constitution, and reasonably adapted to the purpose by reason of legitimate relation between such commerce and the rule provided, the question of power is foreclosed. 'The test of power,' said Mr. Justice White, speaking for this court in the employers' liability cases, cited above, 'is not merely the matter regulated, but whether the regulation is directly one of interstate commerce or is embraced within the grant (of power) conferred on Congress to use all lawful means necessary and appropriate to the execution of the power to regulate commerce.'"

Before applying that well-considered case to the subject matter of a compensation act let us examine what liberty of contract really means. The Constitution does not confer liberty of contract. The bill of rights denies Congress in the fifth amendment power to deprive "life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The difference between "the rights of man," the natural rights, namely, equality, freedom, self-preservation, and property, or the right that inheres in man to things proper to his enjoyment, and between the guarantee of the fifth amendment is the difference between two schools of thought. The rights of man based on the bill of rights, especially those of Virginia. The French form and the sharp accentuation of jural equality before the law is based on the influence of Rousseau. The idea of rights inherent, perpetual, and born with individual and not as a citizen of a State, have different consequences and a different source than the civic rights based on a social contract. The American theory of human rights bases on religious and not political origin, and is consequently a fruit of the Reformation and its contests. The New England colonies, Pilgrims and Puritans, carried the idea of a contract such as a religious community represented into the theory of the State. But the State never is and never was founded upon consent or contract. And the courts in many cases have transferred this mistaken political argument derived from theology into a field of economics. As shown above, the Supreme Court is beginning to reject consequences based on this false analogy of an academic freedom to the actualities of economic existence.

Therefore it would seem that Congress may impose as an absolute duty of requital for injuries on the carrier maiming its servants that of standing liable for the initial mishap to freight, no matter who actually caused the damage. In the Riverside Mills case (219 U. S., 186) the Supreme Court sustained the principle that the right of action against the actual tort feasor by the initial carrier paying the loss did not violate liberty of contract. In a compensation act, safeguarding the rights of the carrier to charge the Government for hauling the mail or increase its rates in a similar manner safeguards its rights.

Still less support is found for this academic freedom of contract under the theory of the Oklahoma Bank cases (219 U. S., 104, 121). above explained, no more need be said.

"In answering that question we must be cautious about pressing the broad words of the fourteenth amendment to a dryly logical extreme. Many laws which it would be vain to ask the court to overthrow could be shown easily enough to transgress a scholastic interpretation of one or another of the great guaranties in the Bill of Rights. They more or less limit the liberty of the individual or they diminish property to a certain extent. We have few scientifically certain criteria of legislation, and as it is often difficult to mark the line where what is called the police power of the States is limited by the Constitution of the United States, judges should be slow to read into the latter a nolumus mutere as against the law-making power. * * * Nevertheless, notwithstanding the logical form of the objection, there are more powerful objections on the other side. In the first place, it is established by a series of cases that an ulterior public advantage may justify a comparatively insignificant taking of private property for what in its immediate purpose is a private use (citing cases). And in the next it would seem that there may be other cases besides the every-day one of taxation, in which the share of each party in the benefit of a scheme of mutual protection is sufficient compensation for the correlative burden that it is compelled to assume (citing cases). At least, if we have a case within the reasonable exercise of the police power, as above explained, no more need be said.

"It may be said in a general way that the police power extends to all the great public needs (citing case). It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderating opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare. Among matters of that sort probably few would doubt that both usage and preponderant opinion give their sanction to enforcing the primary conditions of successful commerce. * * * It has been held, we do not doubt correctly, that inspections may be required and the cost thrown on the bank (citing case). The power to compel, beforehand, cooperation, and thus, it is believed, to make failure unlikely and a general panic almost impossible must be recognized if government is to do its proper work, unless we can say that the means have no reasonable relation to the end (citing case)."

In spite of the opinion of the New York Court of Appeals, which claimed that these bank cases had no weight in deciding the question of the power of changing the law, we contend that these cases support the contention of those who claim that if a State can require all banks to contribute toward a fund to safeguard in anticipation the property of its creditors Congress must have the same power under the commerce power to require as a condition that carriers shall pay compensation to those killed and injured in the every-day's work of the railroad service. Again, the power of changing the status of the railroad men can not be denied, and there can be annexed thereto such conditions of contracting for service in respect of interstate commerce as shall seem proper to the Congress. And such a condition of requiring requital at the hands of those that maim men can be required of those carrying on a public function quite as properly as can the duty be attached to those who handle the funds of the community. If the various States have the power to call on those, blameless, without fault, or negligence or deviation from the standard of the conduct of the most prudent man about his own affairs (where the standard of negligence has some juristic and sociologic basis) to stand a loss "to compel beforehand cooperation," the Supreme Court is apt to sustain legislation by Congress whose object it is to safeguard human life. As Lord Salisbury, in often-quoted language, well said, speaking in the House of Lords on July 20, 1897:

"To my mind, the great attraction of this bill is that I believe it will turn out a great machinery for the saving of life. This is the real history of this law of compensation. The law of compensation at the beginning of the century was taken up by the juries, and instead of compensation for the real injury incurred being given, it was used by them as a punitive instrument to force these great owners and railway companies to strain their efforts to the utmost in avoiding and preventing the accidents, which at one time were so numerous. It has been very successful so far as regards the ordinary passenger or ordinary citizen, but the law of common employment has damaged its efficacy as regards the workingman. We are now, by wise and general revision of the principle on which the law rests, applying it for the purpose for which it was originally destined, and for which it has been conveniently and most profitably employed, the purpose of forcing all who, by the process of industry or the accident of their position, have the lives of their fellow men in their power—forcing them to spare neither labor nor ingenuity nor money in making our industries as safe as possible to those by whom they are carried on." (Hansard, Parliamentary Debates, 1897, vol. 51, p. 555.)

There is power to change the status of those working on railroads, even if not directly connected with the interstate carriage of traffic, conferred by the first clause of the fifteenth amendment. It is certainly as sound in reason and policy to argue that there is power under that amendment to impose on those killing and maiming over a million men since 1887 the absolute duty of repairing in part the economic loss sustained by the whole community as there is in the argument that the fifth amendment precludes Congress from having power of changing the imported un-American standard of negligence. The status of the servant is not so fixed by the fifth amendment that Congress has not the power to change it under the commerce power supported by the fifteenth amendment.

To effect the change in the status it may be necessary to bring about incidental takings of property, but only incidental, because as soon as it becomes of value to the carriers to have to become careful of the lives of their servants, as they now are required to be of cattle and freight intrusted to their care, the self-interest affecting their surplus will take heed of their social duties. The courts can and will help the change, for up to now they have always placed the blame for existing conditions upon the legislative branch of the Government. The courts can then give heed to the changed condition of evidence, a proper consequence of the changed condition of the status of the servants, for the diminished status or denial of the right to compensation has been justified and brought about only by the exclusion of what really determined the injury, viz, professional risk, the most material matter in the case. By requiring the exclusion of what by the mass of those best informed is considered a subsidiary matter, the so-called negligence, and by substituting for the consideration of the courts (if a suit is required) the actual conditions based on professional risk, the status of the workers is enchanced, and if our reasoning has been correct, by due process of law. The prevailing morality of the best minds in the community (neither corporation lawyers, nor yet servants, as both are parties in interest, but dissenting judges, or those overruled in hard cases by those courts standing by the old decisions, or the conservatism of past courts, publicists, and authors, and all those with capacity to appreciate the force of the feeling of social unrest and injustice propagated by the administration of the archaic system of the law of man—master and servant—heretofore patiently borne), all agree as a political necessity that a compensation act must be established.

They do not believe that the Supreme Court will interpose a nolumus mutare to preserve life and limb, by arguments based on the preponderating sanctity of property, because the logic of events that upheld the safety-appliance acts as absolute standards of obligation, that upheld the principles of the employers' liability act and the Carmack amendment case, show that there is enough insight into the science of human interrelations in that body to justify the hopes of mankind that they will not blindly interpose a rule of property to justify the holders of public franchise to kill and maim without requital. Such sociologic insight was recently shown in the opinions sustaining the Oregon women's laundry acts (208 U. S., 412), the Federal hours of service act, and the Tennessee miners' law (183 U. S., 13) that the danger of a resort to the liberty of contract whereby blacklisting was legalized in the Adair case (208 U. S., 161) will probably never again be resorted to by that court.

RESORT TO A COURT OF LAW.

If in the premises it has been shown that neither due process of law nor liberty of contract would of necessity be violated by an act which in principle displaces the standard of care, heretofore set up by the courts, by one of unqualified and absolute duty of safeguarding life and limb, resort to the courts can not be required, save on such terms as are called for to permit the rights of the parties to determine the application of the act.

LEGISLATIVE POWER.

The contract of railroad employees with interstate carriers for service is protected by the same power as is the contract of the shipper with the same carrier for freight service. And the fact that it affects and indeed overrides State rate regulations is indifferent, since the paramount authority governs. But Congress has changed the rule for liability for damages to freight in the Carmack amendment case (Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co. v. Riverside Mills, 219 U. S., 186), in which Lurton, J., said:

"In the employers' liability cases, Howard v. Illinois Central Railroad Co. (207 U. S., 463), power to pass an act which regulated the relation of master and servant so as to impose on the carrier, while engaged in interstate commerce, liability for the negligence of a fellow servant for which at common law there was no liability, and depriving such carrier of the common-law defense of contributory negligence, save by way of reduction of damages, was upheld. In Addyston, etc., Co. v. United States (175 U. S., 211) and Northern Securities Co. v. United States (193 U. S., 197) it was held that this regulation extended to and embraced contracts in restraint of trade between the States. It is obvious from the many decisions of this court that there is no such thing as absolute freedom of contract. Contracts which contravene public policy can not be made at all; and the power to make contracts may in all cases be regulated as to form, evidence, and validity as to third parties. The power of government extends to the denial of liberty of contract to the extent of forbidding or regulating every contract which is reasonably calculated to injuriously affect the public interests. Undoubtedly the United States is a Government of limited and delegated powers, but in respect of those powers which have been expressly delegated—the power to regulate commerce between the States being one of them—the power is absolute, except as limited by other provisions of the Constitution itself.

"Having the express power to make rules for the conduct of commerce among the States, the range of congressional discretion as to the regulation best adapted to remedy a practice found inefficient or hurtful is a wide one. If the regulating act be one directly applicable to such commerce, not obnoxious to any other provision of the Constitution, and reasonably adapted to the purpose by reason of legitimate relation between such commerce and the rule provided, the question of power is foreclosed.

"The test of power," said Mr. Justice White, speaking for this court in the Employers' Liability cases, cited above, "is not merely the matter regulated, but whether the regulation is directly one of interstate commerce or is embraced within the grant (of power) conferred on Congress to use all lawful means necessary and appropriate to the execution of the power to regulate commerce." * * *

If the power existed and the regulation is adapted to the purpose in view, the public advantage justifies the discretion exercised and upholds the legislation as within the limit of the grant conferred upon Congress. Touching the range of legislative discretion of the States in respect to occupations and trades which are affected by a public use, this court, in Gundling v. Chicago (177 U. S., 183), said:

"Unless the regulations are so utterly unreasonable and extravagant in their nature and purpose that the property and personal rights of the citizen are unnecessarily, and in a manner wholly arbitrary, interfered with or destroyed without due process of law, they do not extend beyond the power of the State to pass, and they form no subject for Federal interference. As stated in Crowley v. Christensen (137 U. S., 86):

"'The possession and enjoyment of all rights are subject to such reasonable conditions as may be deemed by the governing authority of the country essential to the safety, health, good order, and morals of the community.'"

LEGISLATIVE POWER.

In the reargued and amended opinion in Noble State Bank v. Haskell (219 U. S., 575) Holmes, J., said:

"We fully understand the practical importance of the question, and the very powerful argument that can be made against the wisdom of the legislation, but on that point we have nothing to say, as it is not our concern. * * * For in this case there is no out-and-out taking at all. The payment can be avoided by going out of the banking business, and is required only as a condition for keeping on from corporations created by the State."

While in the original case (219 U. S., 104) Holmes, J., had said:

"In answering that question (viz, unless that statute deprives the plaintiff bank of liberty or property without due process of law) we must be careful about pressing the broad words of the fourteenth amendment to a dryly logical extreme. Many laws which it would be vain to ask the court to overthrow could be shown, easily enough, to transgress a scholastic interpretation of one or another of the great guaranties in the Bill of Rights. They more or less limit the liberty of the individual, or they diminish property to a certain extent. We have few scientifically certain criteria of legislation, and as it is often difficult to mark the line where what is called the police power of the States is limited by the Constitution of the United States, judges should be slow to read into the latter a nolumus mutare as against the law-making power.

"In the first place, it is established by a series of cases that an ulterior public advantage may justify a comparatively insignificant taking of private property for what, in its immediate purpose, is a private use. (Citing cases.) And in the next it would seem that there may be other cases besides the everyday one of taxation, in which the share of each party in the benefit of a scheme of mutual protection is sufficient compensation for the correlative burden that it is compelled to assume. (See Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S., 190.) At least, if we have a case within the reasonable exercise of the police power, as above explained, no more need be said.

"It may be said in a general way that the police power 'extends to all the great public needs.' (Camfield v. U. S., 167 U. S., 518.) It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderating opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare. Among matters of that sort probably few would doubt that both usage and preponderant opinion give their sanction to enforcing the primary conditions of successful commerce. The power to restrict liberty by fixing a minimum of capital required of those who would engage in banking is not denied. The power to restrict investments to securities regarded as relatively sage seems equally plain. It has been held, we do not doubt, rightly that inspections may be required and the cost thrown on the bank. (Charlotte, etc., Railway Co. v. Gibbes, 142 U. S., 386.) The power to compel beforehand cooperation, and thus it is believed to make a failure unlikely and a general panic almost impossible, must be recognized if Government is to do its proper work, unless we can say that the means have no reasonable relation to the end. (Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S., 188.) So far is that from being the case that the device is a familiar one. It was adopted by some States the better part of a century ago and seems never to have been questioned until now. From the above it may be concluded that Congress has the same power to require railroads to submit to taxation for the sake of relieving those killed and injured in their work as the States have to get up an insurance fund to pay insolvent banks from the contributions of the solvent ones."

Veazie Bank v. Fenno (75 U. S., 548). Opinion of the court:

"It is insisted, however, that the tax in the case before us is excessive, and so excessive as to indicate a purpose on the part of Congress to destroy the franchise of the bank, and is therefore beyond the constitutional power of Congress.

"The first answer to this is that the judicial can not prescribe to the legislative departments of the Government limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged powers. The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the legislature is not to the courts, but to the people by whom its members are elected. So if a particular tax bears heavily upon a corporation or a class of corporations it can not for that reason only be pronounced contrary to the Constitution."

LEGISLATIVE POWER NOT TO BE LIGHTLY DISTURBED BY COURTS.

In M., K. & T. Ry. Co. v. May (194 U. S., 270), Holmes, J., said:

"It may be that the neglected strips occupied by railroads afford a ground where noxious weeds specially flourish, and that whereas self-interest leads the owners of farms to keep down pests, the railroad companies have done nothing in a matter which concerns their neighbors only. Other reasons may be imagined. Great constitutional provisions must be administered with caution. Some play must be allowed for the joints of the machine, and it must be remembered that legislatures are ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts."

Wisconsin Supreme Court held that—

"The weight of authority is in favor of leaving the party injured without remedy when the damage inflicted is for the public good and is remote and inconsequential." (Pumpelly v. Canal Co., 13 Wall., 186.)

DUE PROCESS OF LAW—CHANGE OF REMEDY.

In Bronson v. Kinzie (1 How., 315) it was said:

"It must reside in every State to enable it to secure its citizens from unjust and oppressive litigation, and to protect them in those pursuits which are necessary to the existence and well-being of every community."

LEGISLATIVE POWER.

In the Legal Tender cases (12 Wall., 457, p. 309) it was said:

"Is it our province to decide that the means selected were beyond the constitutional power of Congress, because we may think that other means to the same end would have been more appropriate and equally efficient? That would be to assume legislative power and to disregard the accepted rules for construing the Constitution. The degree of the necessity for any congressional enactment, or the relative degree of its appropriateness, is for the consideration of Congress, not here."

Said Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland, as already stated:

"When the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department and to tread on legislative ground."

LEGISLATIVE POWER AND DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

In the Commodities Clause case (U. S. v. D. & H. R. R. Co., 213 U. S., 407) White, J., thus stated the case (on which they finally upheld the clause):

"And involved in the determination of the foregoing questions we shall necessarily be called on to decide: (a) Did the adoption of the Constitution and the grant of power to Congress to regulate commerce have the effect of depriving the States of the authority to endow a carrier with the attribute of producing as well as transporting particular commodities—a power which the States from the beginning have freely exercised, and by the exertion of which governmental power the resources of the several States have been developed, their enterprises fostered, and vast investments of capital have been made possible? (b) Although the Government of the United States, both within its spheres of national and local legislative power, has in the past for public purposes, either expressly or impliedly, authorized the manufacture, mining, production, and carriage of commodities by one and the same railway corporation, was the exertion of such power beyond the scope of the authority of Congress or, what is equivalent thereto, was its exercise but a mere license, subject at any time to be revoked and completely destroyed by means of a regulation of commerce?"

And on page 416:

"* * * That it (the act) merely and unequivocally is confined to a regulation which Congress had the power to adopt and to which all preexisting rights of the railroad companies are subordinated. We think it unnecessary to consider at length the contention based upon the due-process clause of the fifth amendment. In form of statement these contentions apparently rest upon the ruinous consequence which it assumed would be operated upon the property rights of the carriers by the enforcement of the clause, interpreted as the Government construed it.

"For the purpose of our consideration of the subject it may be conceded, as insisted on behalf of the United States, that these contentions proceed upon the mistaken and baleful conception that inconvenience, not power, is the criterion by which to test the constitutionality of legislation."

LEGISLATIVE DISCRETION.

Field, J., said in Missouri Pacific Railway Co. v. Humes (115 U. S., 512):

"If the laws enacted by a State be within the legitimate sphere of legislative power and their enforcement be attended with the observance of those general rules which our system of jurisprudence prescribes for the security of private rights, the harshness, injustice, and oppressive character of such laws will not invalidate them as affecting life, liberty, or property without due process of law. * * * And it often happens that heavy and oppressive burdens are imposed by statute upon residents of cities and counties, not merely to meet the necessary expenses of government, but for buildings and improvements of doubtful advantage, which sometimes, as in changing the grade of streets, seriously depreciate the value of property. Yet if no rule of justice is violated in the provisions for the enforcement of such a statute, its operation, in lessening the value of the property affected, does not bring it under the objection of depriving a person of property without due process of law. It is hardly necessary to say that the hardship, impolicy, or injustice of State laws is not necessarily an objection to their constitutional validity, and that the remedy for evils of that character is to be sought from the State legislatures.

"In few instances could the power be more wisely and beneficently exercised than in compelling railroad companies to inclose their roads with fences, having gates at crossings, and cattle guards. The speed and momentum of the locomotive render such protection against accident in thickly settled portions of the country absolutely essential, the omission to erect and maintain such fences and cattle guards in the face of the law would justly be deemed gross negligence, and if, in such cases where injuries to property are committed, something beyond compensatory damages may be awarded to the owner by way of punishment for the company's negligence, the legislature may fix amount or prescribe the limit within which the jury may exercise their discretion. The additional damages being by way of punishment, it is clear that the amount may be thus fixed; and it is not a valid objection that the sufferer instead of the State receives them. That is a matter on which the company has nothing to say. And there can be no rational ground for contending that the statute deprives it of property without due process of law. The statute only fixes the amount of the penalty in damages proportionate to the injury inflicted. The power of the State to impose fines and penalties for a violation of its statutory requirements is coeval with government; and the mode in which they shall be enforced, whether at the suit of a private party or at the suit of the public, and what disposition shall be made of the amounts collected, are merely matters of legislative discretion. * * * And experience favors this legislation as the most efficient mode of preventing, with the least inconvenience, the commission of injuries."

In Gundling v. Chicago (117 U. S.), at page 189, it was said:

"It is not a valid objection to the ordinance that it partakes of both the character of a regulation and also that of an excise or privilege tax. The business (in this case, dealing in cigarettes) is more easily subjected to the power to regulate where a license is imposed for following the same, while the revenue obtained on account of the license is none the less legal, because the ordinance which authorized it fulfills the two functions, one a regulating one and the other a revenue function. So long as the State law authorizes both regulation and taxation it is enough, and the enforcement of the ordinance violates no provision of the Federal Constitution."

In Hammond Packing Co. v. Arkansas (212 U. S., 322), at page 350, White, J., said:

"The fundamental guaranty of due process is absolute and not merely relative. * * * Indeed, in Hovey v. Elliott (167 U. S., 409) the impotency of the legislative department to endow the judicial with the capacity to disregard the Constitution was emphasized. * * * To determine this question, we must take into view the authority below, exerted not from a merely formal point of view but in its most fundamental aspect. That is to say, we must trace the power to its true source, and if from doing so it results that the authority exerted flows from a reservoir of unquestioned power, it must follow that the action below was not unlawful, albeit in some narrower aspect that action might be considered as unlawful. The essential basis for the exercise of power, and not a mere incidental result, is the criterion by which its validity is to be measured. The want of power in the one case and its existence in the other are essential to due process—to preserve in the one and to apply and enforce in the other."

POWER, DUAL LEGISLATIVE—CONGRESS SUPREME.

Hale v. Henkel (201 U. S., 43) was on appeal to review a discharge of habeas corpus to inquire into a commitment for contempt on refusal to testify and produce papers before the grand jury in the Tobacco Trust cases. (Affirmed.)

Brown, J., in the course of the opinion, said (on p. 75):

"It is true that the corporation in this case was chartered under the laws of New Jersey, and that it receives its franchise from the legislature of that State; but such franchises, so far as they involve questions of interstate commerce, must also be subordinated to the power of Congress to regulate such commerce, and in respect to this the General Government may also assert a sovereign authority to ascertain whether such franchises have been exercised in a lawful manner with a due regard to its own laws. Being subject to this dual sovereignty, the General Government possesses the same right to see that its own laws are respected as the State would have with respect to the special franchises vested in it by the laws of the State. The powers of the General Government in this particular, in the vindication of its own laws, are the same as if the corporation had been created by an act of Congress. It is not intended to intimate, however, that it has a general visitorial power over State corporations."

In United States v. Heinszen (206 U. S.), at page 385, White, J., said:

"But the proposition begs the question for decision by shutting out from view the potential fact that when the goods were brought into the Philippine Islands there was a tariff in existence under which duties were exacted in the name of the United States. Indeed, the contention goes even further than this, since it entirely disregards the important consideration that, although duties were illegally exacted, the illegality was not the result of an inherent want of power in the United States to have authorized the imposition of the duties, but simply arose from the failure to delegate to the official the authority essential to give immediate validity to his conduct in enforcing the payment of the duties."

In Hannibal & St. J. Railroad Co. v. Husen (95 U. S., 465) the court, speaking generally, said that the police power of a State extended to the making of regulations "promotive of domestic order, morals, health, and safety." It was there held, among other things, to be "within the range of legislative action to define the mode and manner in which everyone may so use his own as not to injure others," and that "the police powers of a State justified the adoption of precautionary measures against social evils," and the enactment of such laws as would have "immediate connection with the protection of persons and property against the noxious acts of others." (From a quotation of Supreme Court in Plumley v. Massachusetts in 155 U. S., at p. 478.) * * * "These and other like things having immediate connection with the health, morals, and safety of the people may be done by the States in the exercise of the right of self-defense."

In Juillard v. Greenman (110 U. S., 214–421) it was said:

"It appears to us to follow, as a logical and necessary consequence, that Congress has the power to issue the obligations of the United States in such form and to impress upon them such quality as currency for the purchase of merchandise and the payments of debts as accord with the usage of sovereign governments. * * * Congress, as the legislature of a sovereign Nation, being expressly empowered by the Constitution to lay and collect taxes to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, * * * and the power to make the notes of the Government a legal tender in payment of private debts being one of the powers belonging to sovereignty in other civilized nations and not expressly withheld from Congress by the Constitution; we are irresistibly impelled to the conclusion that the impression upon the Treasury notes of the United States the quality of being a legal tender in payment of private debts is an appropriate means, conducive and plainly adapted to the execution of the undoubted powers of Congress, consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and, therefore, within the meaning of that instrument, 'necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States.' * * * The question of expediency is a political one, 'to be determined by Congress when the question of exigency arises, and not a judicial question, to be afterwards passed on by the courts' (quoting Marshall, C. J., in the McCulloch bank case, 4 Wheat., 423)."

POWER OF CONGRESS AND THE COURTS.

In United States v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (01 U. S., 72–91) it was said:

"We can not go into an argument on the consequences which follow our decision. Consequences are not an element to be considered in the determination of the question whether an act of incorporation is less beneficial to the Government than was supposed. And whether an act of Congress be more or less politic and wise, it is not our province to determine. When we have declared the meaning of it, if there be power to pass it, our duty in connection with it is ended."

In the same case it was said:

"The loss of our Pacific possessions was feared; but even if this fear were groundless it was quite apparent that we were unable to furnish that degree of protection to the people occupying them which every government owes to its citizens.

"No argument can be drawn from the wisdom that comes after the fact.

"In construing an act of Congress we are not at liberty to recur to the views of individual Members in debate, nor to consider the motives which influenced them to vote for or against its passage. The act itself speaks the will of Congress, and this is to be ascertained from the language used."

Occupation, itself, is commerce (Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S., 47–62):

"If the subject was one which appertained to the jurisdiction of the State legislature it may be that the requirements and the conditions of doing business within the State would be promotive of the public good. It is clear, however, that it would be a regulation of interstate commerce in its application to corporations or associations engaged in that business; and that is a subject which belongs to the jurisdiction of the National, and not the State, legislature. Congress would undoubtedly have the right to exact from associations of that kind any guaranties it might deem necessary for the public security and for the faithful transaction of business; and as it is within the province of Congress it is to be presumed that Congress has done or will do all that is necessary and proper in that regard. Besides, it is not to be presumed that the State of origin has neglected to require from any such corporation proper guaranties as to capital and other securities necessary for the public safety. If a partnership firm of individuals should undertake to carry on the business of interstate commerce between Kentucky and other States, it would not be within the province of the State legislature to exact conditions on which they should carry on their business, nor to require them to take out a license therefor. To carry on interstate commerce is not a franchise or a privilege granted by the State; it is a right which every citizen of the United States is entitled to exercise under the Constitution and laws of the United States; and the accession of mere corporate facilities, as a matter of convenience in carrying on their business, can not have the effect of depriving them of such right unless Congress should see fit to interpose some contrary regulation on the subject.

"It has frequently been laid down by this court that the power of Congress over interstate commerce is as absolute as it is over foreign commerce. Would anyone pretend that a State legislature could prohibit a foreign corporation—an English or a French transportation company, for example—from coming into its borders and landing goods and passengers at its wharves and soliciting goods and passengers for a return voyage without first obtaining a license from some State officer and filing a sworn statement as to the amount of its capital stock paid in? And why not? Evidently because the matter is not within the province of State legislation, but within that of national legislation. (Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, 94 U. S., 238, 24:118.) The prerogative, the responsibility, and the duty of providing for the security of the citizens and the people of the United States in relation to foreign corporate bodies or foreign individuals with whom they may have relations of foreign commerce belong to the Government of the United States, and not to the governments of the several States; and confidence in that regard may be reposed in the National Legislature without any anxiety or apprehension arising from the fact that the subject matter is not within the province or jurisdiction of the State legislatures. And the same thing is exactly true with regard to interstate commerce as it is with regard to foreign commerce. No difference is perceivable between the two."

In the draft bill, H. R. 831, provision for resort to Federal courts is permitted, and under the decision of the diseased-aliens restriction case, the Oceanic Steamship Co. v. Stranahan (214 U. S., 320), that is sufficient.

The following appears in Oceanic Steamship Navigation Co. v. Stranahan (214 U. S., 320): "Resting, as the statute does, upon the authority of Congress over foreign commerce and its right to control the coming of aliens into the United States, and to regulate that subject in the fullest degree, reserving for future consideration the particular contentions advanced at bar by the plaintiff in error, it may not be doubted that it is not open to discussion that the statute as thus construed was within the power of Congress to enact. In Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 470), considering the subject, it was said (pp. 492, 493):

"'Whatever difference of opinion, if any, may have existed or does exist concerning the limitations of the power resulting from other provisions of the Constitution, so far as interstate commerce is concerned, it is not to be doubted that from the beginning Congress has exercised a plenary power in respect to the exclusion of merchandise brought from foreign countries; not alone directly by the enactments of embargo statutes, but indirectly as a necessary result of provisions contained in tariff legislation. It has also, in other than tariff legislation, exerted a police power over foreign commerce by provisions which in and of themselves amounted to the assertion of the right to exclude merchandise at discretion.

"'As a result of the complete power of Congress over foreign commerce, it necessarily follows that no individual has a vested right to trade with foreign nations, which is so broad in character as to limit and restrict the power of Congress to determine what articles of merchandise may be imported into this country and the terms upon which a right to import may be exercised. This being true, it results that a statute which restrains the introduction of particular goods into the United States from considerations of public policy does not violate the due-process clause of the Constitution.'

"In accord with this settled judicial construction, the legislation of Congress from the beginning, not only as to tariff, but as to internal revenue, taxation, and other subjects, has proceeded on the conception that it was within the competency of Congress, when legislating as to matters exclusively within its control, to impose appropriate obligations and sanction their enforcement by reasonable money penalties, giving to executive officers the power to enforce such penalties without the necessity of invoking the judicial power.

"It is insisted that the decisions just stated and the legislative practices referred to are inapposite here, because they all relate to subjects peculiarly within the authority of the legislative department of the Government and which, from the necessity of things, required the concession that administrative officers should have the authority to enforce designated penalties without resort to the courts. But over no conceivable subject is the legislative power of Congress more complete than it is over that which the act we are now considering deals. If the proposition implies that the right of Congress to enact legislation is to be determined not by the grant of power made by the Constitution, but by considering the particular emergency which has caused Congress to exert a specified power, then the proposition is obviously without foundation. This is apparent, since the contention then would proceed upon the assumption that it is within the competency of judicial authority to control legislative action as to subjects over which there is complete legislative authority, on the theory that there was no necessity calling for the exertion of legislative power.

"As the authority of Congress over the right to bring aliens into the United States embraces every conceivable aspect of that subject, it must follow that if Congress has deemed it necessary to impose particular restrictions on the coming in of aliens, and to sanction such prohibitions by penalties enforceable by administrative authority, it follows that the constitutional right of Congress to enact such legislation is the sole measure by which its validity is to be determined by the courts. The suggestion that if this view be applied grave abuses may arise from the mistaken or wrongful exertion by the legislative department of its authority, but intimates that if the legislative power be permitted its full sway within its constitutional sphere harm and wrong will follow, and therefore it behooves the judiciary to apply a corrective by exceeding its own authority. But, as was pointed out in Cary v. Curtis (3 Hos., 236), and as has been often since emphasized by this court (McCray v. United States, 195 U. S., 27), the proposition but mistakenly assumes that the courts can alone be safely intrusted with power, and that hence it is their duty to unlawfully exercise prerogatives which they have no right to exert, upon the assumption that wrong must be done to prevent wrong being accomplished.

"3. It is urged that the fines which constituted the exactions were repugnant to the fifth amendment, because amounting to a taking of property without due process of law, since, as asserted, the fines were imposed in some cases without any previous notice and in all cases without any adequate notice or opportunity to defend.

"In view of the absolute power of Congress over the right to bring aliens into the United States, we think it may not be doubted that the act would be beyond all question constitutional if it forbade the introduction of aliens afflicted with contagious diseases, and as a condition to the right to bring in aliens imposed upon every vessel bringing them in, as a condition of the right to do so, a penalty for every alien brought to the United States afflicted with the prohibited disease, wholly without reference to when and where the disease originated. It must then follow that the provision contained in the statute is of course valid, since it only subjects the vessel to the exaction when, as the result of the medical examination for which the statute provides, it appears that the alien immigrant afflicted with the prohibited malady is in such a stage of the disease that it must, in the opinion of the medical officer, have existed and been susceptible of discovery at the point of embarkation.

"Indeed, it is not denied that there was full power in Congress to provide for the examination of the alien by medical officers and to attach conclusive effect to the result of that examination for the purposes of exclusion or deportation. But is is said the power to do so does not include the right to make the medical examination conclusive for the purpose of imposing a penalty upon the vessel for the negligent bringing in of an alien. We think the argument rests upon a distinction without a difference. It disregards the purpose which, as we have already pointed out, Congress had in view in the enactment of the provision; that is, the guarding against the danger to arise from the wrongful taking on board of an alien afflicted with a contagious malady, not only to other immigrant passengers, but ultimately, it might be, to the entire people of the United States, a danger arising from the possible admission of aliens who might contract the contagion during the voyage and yet be entitled to admission because apparently not afflicted with the prohibited disease, owing to the fact that the time has not elapsed for the manifestation of its presence.

"In effect all the contentions pressed in argument concerning the repugnancy of the statute to the due process clause really disregarded the complete and absolute power of Congress over the subject with which the statute deals. They mistakenly assume that mere form and not substance may be made by the courts the conclusive test as to the constitutional power of Congress to enact a statute. These conclusions are apparent, we think, since the plenary power of Congress as to the admission of aliens leaves no room for doubt as to its authority to impose the penalty, and its complete administrative control over the granting or refusal of a clearance also leaves no doubt of the right to endow administrative officers with discretion to refuse to perform the administrative act of granting a clearance as a means of enforcing the penalty which there was lawful authority to impose."

PART II.—BASES OF THE EXERCISE OF LEGISLATIVE POWER.

A compensation is constitutional which is based on the power to regulate commerce among the States, to establish post offices and post roads, to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to * * * provide for the * * * general welfare, and to any combination of the above, not in other respects violating the constitutional safeguards.

IN GENERAL.

Under legislative power we propose to treat first of the subject in general and adduce the opinions of the court on that general phase of the question, and then to take up the specific points in particular and apply thereto the law as developed from the opinions of the Supreme Court.

The premises have shown that there is no valid constitutional objection to the enactment of a restricted Federal compensation act. That is, that in principle the fifth amendment does not in and of itself bar Congress from changing the rules heretofore enunciated by the courts and to substitute, in place of evidence of negligence, the standard of professional risk. Without discussing any particular draft or bill, let us see what has been said about legislative power in general.

SECTION 1. Railroad companies, though chartered by the States, are in respect of their interstate functions as completely subject to Federal regulation and domination as though originally of Federal creation. (Hale v. Henkel, 201 U. S., 43.)

SEC. 2. The power to regulate commerce is, when applied to the narrow scope of that power, or delegated grant, as ample as is the police power of the States. To state it in another way, the mere name or source of the power does not change or affect the new methods to be taken in applying the power. Whatever changes the States may effect under the police power are open to the United States in respect of such powers as directly affect the matters committed to the United States under the commerce power. Thus Lurton, J., said, in Atlantic Coast Line Co. v. Riverside Mills (219 U. S., 186), upholding the Carmack amendment to the twentieth section of the act to regulate commerce:

"It is obvious, from the many decisions of this court, that there is no such thing as absolute freedom of contract. Contracts which contravene public policy can not be lawfully made at all, and the power to make contracts may in all cases be regulated as to form, evidence, and validity as to third persons. The power of government extends to the denial of liberty of contracts to the extent of forbidding or regulating every contract which is reasonably calculated to injuriously affect the public interests. Undoubtedly the United States is a government of limited and delegated powers, but in respect of those powers which have been expressly delegated, the power to regulate commerce between the States being one of them, the power is absolute, except as limited by other provisions of the Constitution itself.

"Having express power to make rules for the conduct of commerce among the States, the range of congressional discretion as the regulation best adapted to remedy a practice found inefficient or hurtful is a wide one. If the regulating act be one directly applicable to such commerce, not obnoxious to any other provision of the Constitution, and reasonably adapted to the purpose by reason of legitimate relation between such commerce and the rule provided, the question of power is foreclosed. 'The test of power,' said Mr. Justice White, speaking for this court in the employers' liability cases, cited above, 'is not merely the matter regulated, but whether the regulation is directly one of interstate commerce, or is embraced within the grant (of power) conferred on Congress to use all lawful means necessary and appropriate to the execution of the power to regulate commerce.'

"That a situation had come about which demanded regulation in the public interest was the judgment of Congress. The requirement that carriers who undertook to engage in interstate transportation, and as a part of that business held themselves out as receiving packages destined to places beyond their own terminal, should be required, as a condition of continuing in that traffic, to obligate themselves to carry to the point of destination, using the lines of connecting carriers as their own agencies, was not beyond the scope of the power of regulation. The rule is adapted to secure the rights of the shipper by securing unity of transportation with unity of responsibility. The regulation is also one which facilitates the remedy of one who sustains a loss, by localizing the responsible carrier."

Section 3. The legislative power is as unlimited within its scope and applicable to conditions of service on land as to those of sea-borne commerce.

Section 4. Granted the plenary grant and source of power of legislation, details of its exercise are not matters for judicial reexamination, but of legislative discretion. (See cases in footnote.)

COMMERCE POWER.

In Rearick v. Penn. (203 U. S., 512), Holmes, J., quoted the following:

"'Commerce among the several States' is a practical conception, not drawn from the 'witty diversities' (Yaites v. Gough (Yelv., 33), of the laws of sales; Swift & Co. v. U. S., 196 U. S., 398, 399)."

In Lyng v. Michigan (135 U. S.) at 166 it was said:

"We have repeatedly held that no State has a right to lay a tax on interstate commerce in any form, whether by way of duties laid on the transporation of the subjects of that commerce, or on the receipts derived from that transportation, or on the occupation or business of carrying it on, for the reason that such taxation is a burden on that commerce and amounts to a regulation of it, which belongs solely to Congress."

In McCall v. California, Lamar said (136 U. S., 104) at page 111:

"The test is, Was this business a part of the commerce of the road? Did it assist or was it carried on with the purpose to assist in increasing the amount of passenger traffic on the road? If it did, the power to tax it involves the lessening of the commerce of the road to an extent commensurate with the amount of business done by the agent."

In the employer's liability cases (207 U. S.) it was conceded by the majority that the regulation of the service of employees while engaged in any sphere of commerce subject to Federal control was subject to congressional regulation.

In the Drummer cases (cited in 204 U. S., 160) this line of thought had been carried to its logical extent, so that the relation of master and servant can be regulated by Congress while the servant of the interstate carrier is engaged in interstate commerce.

Details of what is and what is not interstate commerce are largely matters for Congress. (McNeill v. Southern Ry. Co., 202 U. S., 543.)

State laws may operate on some subject matters until displaced by paramount law. (Colasurdo v. Central R. R. of New Jersey, Fed. Rep.)

Then it would follow that the standard of care, etc., may be changed for interstate carriers and such servants as are solely engaged or maimed by interstate instrumentalities of commerce. (Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S., 99.)

POST ROADS.

I. In the Debs case (158 U. S., 564), it was said:

"Under the power vested in Congress to establish post offices and post roads Congress has, by a mass of legislation, established the great post-office system of the country, with all its detail of organization, its machinery for the transaction of business, defining what shall be carried and what not, and the prices of carriage, and also prescribing penalties for all offenses against it."

Obviously these powers given to the National Government over interstate commerce and in respect to the transportation of the mails were not dormant and unused. Congress had taken hold of these two matters, and by various and specific acts had assumed and exercised the powers given to it, and was in the full discharge of its duty to regulate interstate commerce and carry the mails. The validity of such exercise and the exclusiveness of its control had been again and again presented to this court for consideration. It is curious to note the fact that in a large proportion of the cases in respect to interstate commerce brought to this court the question presented was of the validity of State legislation in its bearings upon interstate commerce, and the uniform course of decision has been to declare that it is not within the competency of a State to legislate in such a manner as to obstruct interstate commerce. If a State with its recognized powers of sovereignty is impotent to obstruct interstate commerce, can it be that any mere voluntary association of individuals within the limits of that State has a power which the State itself does not possess?

As, under the Constitution, power over interstate commerce and the transportation of the mails is vested in the National Government and Congress, by virtue of such grant, has assumed actual and direct control, it follows that the National Government may prevent any unlawful and forcible interference therewith. But how shall this be accomplished? Doubtless it is within the competency of Congress to prescribe by legislation that any interferences with these matters shall be offenses against the United States and prosecuted and punished by indictment in the proper courts.

It seems to follow that if Federal courts can preserve the peace of the United States in freight yards and cattle yards within a State, and can oust the State police power under the judicial power, that Congress must be assumed to have at least as great a power to safeguard the lives and limbs of all employees working or injured on post roads. There is reason for this in the uniformity cases, such as the Gloucester Ferry Co. case (114 U. S., 203), which are to be applied because of the facts of life railroads are operated as a unit.

II. Electric roads are subject to the same rule. The novelty of application is no answer to the exercise of power. Electric roads are less of a revolution than were steam railroads compared to wagons and animals or to sloops, originally used to transport freight over postal routes.

Passenger traffic is, and of itself always has been, peculiarly considered postal traffic. The license by Congress to State-created corporations to haul passengers never was a specific grant and can be rescinded at any time. Conditions for carrying passengers on post roads may therefore be annexed to this exercise of power, practically limited only by the proposition that no absolute taking of the property devoted to public use take place. As long as the passenger traffic is allowed to earn something, the reasonableness of the amount is not a question of judicial but of legislative power. This is a proposition radically different from that of the Congress regulating rates as a legislative function. Rates primarily are made by the railroads under the tacit assent of Congress. The test of reasonableness prescribed by Congress is merely legislatively interpreting a preexisting duty. Not so in the case of passenger rates, where Congress exercises its plenary power over what in all partz of the world, as well as at common law, in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, had been postal traffic. Congress can forbid private corporations to haul passengers (except, perhaps, by the horse, mule, sloop, or post chaise) upon postal roads except on such conditions as it imposes. Congress might tax private carriers out of existence (see "Taxation" hereafter), and the duty of paying compensation for any person injured on such a post road may be annexed to the permission to haul passengers. If this were not so, it would follow that the courts derive from the grant of judicial power a more extensive power of superseding State police than has the Congress from the same Constitution under the post-roads clause.

Congress might impose such onerous taxes on carriers hauling passengers in interstate commerce as to render that occupation unprofitable if Congress wished to create a national passenger service as part of the postal establishment. (On taxing power, see cases cited in footnote.) If Congress can abolish, it can annex to the right of hauling of passengers conditions for rendering more safe the lives and limbs of the men at risk. If the power of taxation is less efficient in the hands of Congress in bringing relief for what it, by the prevalent morality, considers a public use than is the judicial power of superseding the police power of a State to preserve property of carriers and shippers (see Debs and other injunction cases) on a post road, it would seem that the courts would be giving greater protection to the claims of property interests than to human rights. But that sort of reasoning would show that the courts are the mechanism of domination of the property-owning classes, and that standpoint has not as yet been conceded. The courts claim to be acting for all the Nation, rich and poor alike, and where the source of power is undoubted the method of its exercise is purely a matter of legislative discretion. The congressional power of levying taxes on the carriers over postal roads, built though they are by private capital, is absolute. The carriers accepted the Federal statute (14 Stat., 66), haul mail cars over the route, and can not question the regulation by Congress of their postal functions. The power of taxation being public, the use of the proceeds of such tax is no concern of the carriers (Hume's case).

The argument may be made that the regulation of post roads confounds interstate and State employees. The answer is found in this, that no constitutional inhibition prevents Congress from joining in one act powers derived from various grants in the Constitution. Congress has exercised such an amalgamation of powers to justify the grants of vast principalities of public land to the railroads and taxed all the people for the benefit of those holding Pacific Railroad bonds. If it was lawful to join in one act powers derived from the grant of building military roads, postal roads, and the general-welfare clause, and to tax the country for a generation, benefiting those who built the Pacific Railroad, no logical reason can be found, but only political excuses, based on the relations of powerful groups, exist against the validity of enforcing justice for those killed and maimed on these same postal routes, for in principle all railroads are like those Pacific railroads to whom these grants were made.

TAXATION.

The power of taxation may be exercised for the general welfare. No person taxed can be made to see the propriety or justice of a tax. At all times taxes are the symbolic emblems of the political power of a governing class. The attempt to throw the burden of taxation on those politically unable to resist is overcome by the economic power of many economic groups to shift the incidence thereof on the consumer. So that in the last instance the equilibrium of political forces shown in a compromise or in legislation becomes an economic and political and not a legal question. And still more clearly is this seen in the case of taxing railroads. Every tax they are required to pay becomes a charge to operating expenses. Although ultimately this may affect dividends, it may bring about savings in other directions, such as claims for damages, before dividends are affected. But the right of the community to provide safeguards of every kind for those millions of men hourly risked is paramount to the right to dividends. (Covington Turnpike Co. case, 164 U. S., p. 578.) No stockholder has a right so intrenched in and to the unrequited loss of life and limbs of his fellow citizens that it becomes vested as against the power of taxation to relieve such a barbaric situation as now exists in this country. Taxation for such an end is not spoliation; it is salvation to the rest of the property interests of the country.

Taxation of carriages is a proper form of excise taxation specifically permitted by the Constitution as an excise and by the Supreme Court in the income-tax cases. (157 U. S., 430 et seq.)

THE POWER OF TAXATION.

The power of taxation is all pervasive and has, since the origin of the Government, been employed to help enrich a favored class. Indirect taxation has from the time of Hamilton been used by those in control of the Government to further their own ends. Except under spasms of reaction against excessive impositions levied, the people have for a century been forced to pay indirect taxes, enhancing their necessities on the plea of protecting American industries or, in other words, the capitalist class. No objection has been heard from the courts that such protective tariff was class legislation, and the internal-revenue laws, oppressive as they were and inquisitorial as they are, have always been sustained on the ground of legislative power being the test. Surely at this late day the courts can not set aside legislation taxing the instrumentality of commerce when for once legislation is to be exerted in behalf of humanity and the attempt made to make the owners of property bear a just share of those inevitable injuries inclosed in social service. The process of taxing instrumentalities of commerce is due process of law, in spite of what was said in the income-tax cases (Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U. S., p. 430 f. f.). The case of Veazie v. Fenno (75 U. S., p. 534 at p. 546) is still good law. In that case the following was said:

"It may be safely assumed, therefore, as the unanimous judgment of the court, that a tax on carriages is not a direct tax. And it may further be taken, as established upon the testimony of Paterson, that the words 'direct taxes,' as used in the Constitution, comprehended only capitation taxes and taxes on land, and perhaps taxes on personal property by general valuation and assessment of the various descriptions possessed within the several States.

"It follows necessarily that the power to tax without apportionment extends to all other objects. Taxes on other objects are included under the heads of taxes to direct, duties, imposts and excises, and must be laid and collected by the rule of uniformity. The tax under consideration is a tax on bank circulation, and may very well be classed under the head of duties. Certainly it is not, in the sense of the Constitution, a direct tax. It may be said to come within the same category of taxation as the tax on incomes of insurance companies which this court, at the last term, in the case of Pacific Insurance Co. v. Soule, held not to be a direct tax.

"Is it, then, a tax on a franchise granted by a State, which Congress, upon a principle exempting the reserve powers of the States from impairment by taxation, must be held to have no authority to lay and collect?

"We do not say that there may not be such a tax. It may be admitted that the reserved rights of the States, such as the right to pass laws, to give effect to laws through executive action, to administer justice through the courts, and to employ all necessary agencies for legitimate purposes of State government, are not proper subjects of the taxing power of Congress. But it can not be admitted that franchises granted by a State are necessarily exempt from taxation, for franchises are property—often very valuable and productive property—and when not conferred for the purpose of giving effect to some reserved power of a State seem to be as properly objects of taxation as any other property.

"But in the case before us the object of taxation is not the franchise of the bank, but property created, or contracts made and issued, under the franchise or power to issue bank bills. A railroad company in the exercise of its corporate franchises issues freight receipts, bills of lading, and passenger tickets, and it can not be doubted that the organization of railroads is quite as important to the State as the organization of banks.

"But it will hardly be questioned that these contracts of the company are objects of taxation within the powers of Congress, and not exempted by any relation to the State which granted the charter of the railroad. And it seems difficult to distinguish the taxation of notes issued for circulation from the taxation of these railroad contracts. Both descriptions of contracts are means of profit to the corporations which issue them; and both, as we think, may properly be made contributory to the public revenue.

"It is insisted, however, that the tax in the case before us is excessive, and so excessive as to indicate a purpose on the part of Congress to destroy the franchise of the bank, and is therefore beyond the constitutional power of Congress.

"The first answer to this is that the judicial can not prescribe to the legislative departments of the Government limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged powers. The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the legislature is not to the courts, but to the people by whom its members are elected. So if a particular tax bears heavily upon a corporation, or a class of corporations, it can not, for that reason only, be pronounced contrary to the Constitution."

The amount of taxation by an excise tax is a nonjudicial question. In the Veazie Bank case (8 Wall., 533) power to tax State banks out of existence was conceded. The question of power only was one for the consideration of the court. (Hager v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 110 U. S., 113.)

That clause of the fourteenth amendment is found, in almost identical language, in the several State constitutions and is intended as additional security against the arbitrary deprivation of life and liberty and the arbitrary spoliation of life and property. Neither can be taken without due process of law. What constitutes that process it may be difficult to define with precision so as to cover all cases. It is, no doubt, wiser, as stated by Mr. Justice Miller, in Davidson v. New Orleans, to arrive at its meaning "by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require, with the reasoning on which such decisions may be founded." (96 U. S., 104; XXIV, 619.) It is sufficient to observe here that by "due process" is meant one which, following the forms of law, is appropriate to the case and just to the parties to be affected. It must be pursued in the ordinary mode prescribed by the law and must be adapted to the end to be attained; and wherever it is necessary for the protection of the parties, it must give them an opportunity to be heard respecting the justice of the judgment sought. The clause in question means, therefore, that there can be no proceeding against life, liberty, or property which may result in the deprivation of either, without the observance of those general rules established in our jurisprudence for the security of private rights. (Hurtado v. California; ante, 232.)

The appellant contends that this fundamental principle was violated in the assessment of his property, inasmuch as it was made without notice to him or without his being afforded any opportunity to be heard respecting it, the law authorizing it containing no provision for such notice or hearing. His contention is that notice and opportunity to be heard are essential to render any proceeding due process of law which may lead to the deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Undoubtedly, where life and liberty are involved, due process requires that there be a regular course of judicial proceedings, which imply that the party to be affected shall have notice and an opportunity to be heard; so, also, where title or possession of property is involved. But where the taking of property is in the enforcement of a tax, the proceeding is necessarily less formal, and whether notice to him is at all necessary may depend upon the character of the tax and the manner in which its amount is determinable. The necessity of revenue for the support of the Government does not admit of the delay attendant upon proceedings in a court of justice, and they are not required for the enforcement of taxes or assessments. As stated by Mr. Justice Bradley, in his concurring opinion in Davidson v. New Orleans:

"In judging what is 'due process of law' respect must be had to the cause and object of the taking, whether under the taxing power, the power of eminent domain, or the power of assessment for local improvements, or some of these; and if found to be suitable or admissible in the special case, it will be adjudged to be 'due process of law,' but if found to be arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, it may be declared to be not 'due process of law.'"

The power of taxation possessed by the State may be exercised upon any subject within its jurisdiction, and to any extent not prohibited by the Constitution of the United States. As said by this court:

"It may touch property in every shape, in its natural condition, in its manufactured form, and in its various transmutations. And the amount of the taxation may be determined by the value of the property or its use or its capacity or its productiveness. It may touch business in the almost infinite forms in which it is conducted, in professions, in commerce, in manufactures, and in transportation. Unless restrained by provisions of the Federal Constitution, the power of the State, as to the mode, form, and extent of taxation, is unlimited, where the subjects to which it applies are within her jurisdiction." (State tax on foreign-held bonds, 15 Wall., 319; 82 U. S., XXI, 186.)

Of the different kinds of taxes which the State may impose, there is a vast number of which, from their nature, no notice can be given to the taxpayer, nor would notice be of any particular advantage to him, such as poll taxes, license taxes (not dependent upon the extent of his business), and, generally, specific taxes on things or persons or occupations. In such cases the legislature in authorizing the tax fixes its amount, and that is the end of the matter. If the tax be not paid the property of the delinquent may be sold and he be thus deprived of his property. Yet there can be no question that the proceeding is due process of law, as there is no inquiry into the weight of evidence, or other element of a judicial nature, and nothing could be changed by hearing the taxpayer. No right of his is, therefore, invaded. Thus, if the tax on animals be a fixed sum per head, or on articles a fixed sum per yard or bushel or gallon, there is nothing the owner can do which can affect the amount to be collected from him. So, if a person wishes a license to do business of a particular kind or at a particular place, such as keeping a hotel or restaurant, or selling liquors or cigars or clothes, he has only to pay the amount required by law and go into business. There is no need in such cases for notice or hearing. So, also, if taxes are imposed in the shape of licenses for privileges, such as those on foreign corporations for doing business in the State, or on domestic corporations for franchises, if the parties desire the privilege, they have only to pay the amount required. In such cases there is no necessity for notice or hearing. The amount of the tax would not be changed by it.

It will be difficult to see how the Supreme Court could deny power to Congress to tax carriers who do not accept the requirements of enlightened legislation safeguarding the lives and limbs of workmen, when it did permit one class of security holders to crush out of existence by the use of the taxing power another group of bankers. If the Veazle Bank case found its ultimate justification in the need of financial statesmanship and a market for United States securities, there can be no less justification in taxing the instrumentalities of carriers used on Federal postal routes as a last resort of bringing about a change in the status of those at risk. Taxation may be used to further any public end.

In Merchants' National Bank v. United States (101 U. S., 1-6) Waite, C. J., said:

"The tax is on the notes paid out; that is, made use of as a circulating medium. Such a use is against the public policy of the United States * * *. The taxation was no doubt intended to destroy the use; but that, as has just been seen, Congress has the power to do."

The object of an excise tax on the carriages of carriers on a postal route is to bring about the adoption of a principle of a compensation act. Just as the tax sustained by the Supreme Court in the Veazle Bank case was not intended to be used as a revenue measure, so taxation by an excise tax on railroad equipment may be used as a means of obtaining acquiescence in and obedience to the provisions of the compensation act. The object of the tax in each case is to require submission to a new law. It is of quite as much importance to preserves the lives of men at risk as it is to have uniform bank notes. As soon as the burden of paying either compensation (assumed as a contract with the Government) or taxes imposed when not so assumed becomes a vital question, the railroads will see to it that standards, rules, and regulations are obeyed and enough men employed to stop the reckless slaugher of brigades and armies of able-bodied Americans. The power of so taxing the railroads is not open to doubt, as even on the reargument of the income-tax cases the excise taxes in the Hylton Carriage case (3 Dall., 171) was sustained (158 U. S., 127).

Fuller, C. J., said:

"What was decided in the Hylton case was, then, that tax on carriages was an excise, and therefore an indirect tax."

In Veazle Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall., 533), Chase, C. J., said:

"It may safely be assumed, therefore, as the unanimous opinion of the court (in the Hylton case), that a tax on carriages is not a direct tax."

And Story, in his work on the Constitution (vol. 1, 705, sec. 956), said:

"Fifthly, that, accurately speaking, all taxes on expenses or consumption are indirect taxes, and a tax on carriages is of this kind."

The proceeds of the taxation derived from the excise tax when covered into the Treasury are public funds and may be distributed by Congress as it sees fit. Congress has granted bounties, public lands, vast estates, and tariff favors to those classes economically better situated than the workmen, so that the denial of the power of Congress to apportion the proceeds from an excise tax on cars among those killed or injured on railroads would be a subservience to domination of the property-holding class, since no logical method of reasoning could sustain it. The mere statement of a consequence flowing from the decision holding that Congress would not have the power of using the proceeds of an excise tax for the relief of those killed or injured on post roads would seem to show that no danger should be felt therefrom.

The power of regulating commerce among the States was held ample in the employer's liabilities cases (207 U. S.) to give Congress the power of regulating the relation of master and servant, and the same power must flow from the post-office and post-roads clause of the Constitution in respect of the men working on railroads, though not engaged in interstate commerce, but on or with instrumentalities used on post roads. There is no constitutional limitation in favor of property rights, when that property is devoted to commerce or postal traffic, preventing Congress from subjecting it to taxation, and the amount of taxation and the purpose of taxation is a matter of political discussion not reviewable by the courts so long as the taxation be uniform. The taxation proposed by House bill 9831 complies with every constitutional requirement, and the amount is a mere matter of congressional discretion. Since no other standards are called for, Congress may tax the instrumentalities of railway and telegraph companies and may require these enterprises enjoying Federal protection to award social justice to those killed or maimed, all the more so, as such legislation in every other country has made for the preservation of life and limb.

THE STATUS OF EMPLOYEES.

The person of normal capacity has normal rights and is said to enjoy full status.

Whatever disability one is placed under, either politically, juristically, or socially, to that extent diminishes the status in that respect.

Thus a criminal sentenced to imprisonment for life is, by the law, treated as civilly dead, though he may live for many years.

So an absentee for an established term of years leaves his wife free to remarry on the legal presumption of his death, thereby dissolving her marriage condition without affecting the issue previously born.

In all these and allied cases the rules of the law, based on declared public policy, by excluding accessible evidence to controvert authentic facts, affect the status of the individual involved, so that the exclusion of evidence may make for a changed condition of status, and when the exclusion of evidence and the imputations of fictions or nonexisting conditions of physical activity (as in assumption of risk) have been persisted in by the courts there is in consequence created a juristic class of abnormal beings in having less juristic capacity for obtaining redress for grievances than other persons—servants.

These servants, then, are treated by the law as having a lower status; that is, having a lesser right to that standard of justice meted out at the same time to all other persons in like conditions of danger not affected by the status relation.

Being thus deprived of the common justice, it becomes of need for the dominant group to justify, before the conscience of its time, this exercise of power. So that by a necessary perversion of reasoning the very inaptitude in escaping from their status and its consequence is made a matter of reproach to them when they have been maimed and venture to seek redress. By asserting a fiction, and claiming that evidence must be directed to an indifferent matter, namely, the standard of care, and a reasonably safe place to work in, a reasonably careful selection of fellow servants, and the right to starve if conditions do not suit the ideally (meticulous) fault-finding workmen of the court's imagination, and excluding evidence of actual inherent danger of the work, the courts have created what, in fact, amounts to a status as against the workers, not only by excluding evidence in the light of actual conditions of labor, but far more disastrously by importing into the Constitution the theory that their dicta of public policy and convenience (for in the last analysis they are all following Abinger, C. B., and his famous dictum on the inconvenience of compensation) are now, and have been, hallowed by the term "due process of law" to such an extent that the legislature may not change the rule of the incidence of economic loss unless the master was to blame. In other words, they throw about the group theory of blame—negligence—such constitutional concepts, so taboo and sacred, that evidence to remove them is inadmissible, and deny power to legislatures to change them. Thus the courts maintain intact a status, or a presumption of law, not based on logic nor on evidence, but supported in the last instance by the brute power of the State, or of the dominant group. In doing this the courts disregard the very point at issue, namely, whether it is fault or negligence that causes the most serious disasters, or whether it is a danger inherent in the nature of the calling. By first imputing to the constitutional words "due process of law" a sacred and inclusive power, unchangeable by mere legislation, the courts then claim that it is part of the "due process of law" for the master class not to be made liable for compensation unless the injury happened through negligence or fault or words of such like import, although the standard of care of the prudent man has as much to do with the running of a factory or mill, or railroad, as has the binomial theorem.

In thus excluding evidence of the facts of danger, and reading a far-fetched theory of negligence and deviation from an impossible standard of care into the protection of the due process clause of the Constitution, the courts are preserving a status of inferiority of the laborers and a superior status of the master class. For the effect of status is one of economic superiority when, by the exclusion of evidence, those at risk are exploited without redress. The refusal of the courts to permit their views to be changed by the irrefutable evidence of statistics of the killed and wounded in the everyday work of modern industry shows such a deliberate exclusion of the facts of everyday life, when in other cases they undertake to apply the latest researches of science, that it must be presumed to be with the purpose of perpetuating the status of the oppressed and excluded in favor of those who benefit by the exploitation. In excluding evidence that it is not relaxation or deviation from the fictitious and impossible standard of care, but danger inherent in the work, the courts rivet firmer the status of the laborer. This is done by transmuting this exclusion of evidence into a principle of constitutional law, by casting about the erroneous conclusions of bygone courts a sacred protection of property rights, and conversely casting out any legislation attempted to remedy their errors of judgment and of policy, by treating that as a status which should be placed under the regulative power of the legislature.

The progress of the world has been shown in the advance from status to regulation by contract or legislative power. The maintenance or the extension of the relation of status is, and always was, a reactionary means of stifling reform. The attempts of the courts to perpetuate their errors by shifting onto the constitutional "due process of law," a rigidity and continuance of status called into being by their own misunderstanding of the effects of economic laws, is to be deplored, as it makes for instability and lack of harmony in the State.

If the Congress had power to grant public lands and issue and loan the public credit of the United States to any railroads because of the public service—whether as mail or as military routes is indifferent—of the carriers engaging in the work, by a parity of reasoning there must exist power derivable from the same source to change the status of the men at risk on these same roads. If there was power to tax these and other men, to pay interest and to redeem the bonds issued in aid of these railroads—and what applies to one applies to all in respect of their Federal character—there must be the same power to be able legislatively to change the consequences of the status in respect of their Federal service and to annex thereto whatever is held reasonable by the social conscience of the times. There is no Federal common law, as the Supreme Court has declared time and again, and therefore there can logically be no such consequences of the status of laboring men as the Federal courts have by a false analogy imported into their decisions. And there must, logically at least, be the same power of Congress to legislatively declare the consequences of the Federal status of labor as there was in the courts to apply the decisions of State judges to the Federal relation of laboring men working on a Federal highway.

STATUS OF SERVANTS.

Under the provisions of H. R. 9831 the relation heretofore existing between master and servant has been legislatively changed. Service on mail routes and post roads and interstate and foreign commerce has been declared to be "public service" and the employees of a carrier are by the bill declared to be "public servants," thus enacting into law the relation construed by the courts, when in labor disturbances they held the men to be public servants and not allowed to either quit or to strike until such rulings were set aside.

This bill applies to occupations that are of a public character, if the standards heretofore advanced by the courts hold. The railroads are all carried on by corporations, subject in respect of their interstate and mail carriage to Federal regulation as fully as though they had been chartered by the United States (Hale v. Henkel case). The carriage of the mail is part of the public business, and never was anything else. This was used by the courts in the Debs case, when the mail routes and post roads clause was dragged in to justify the judicial power to clear obstructions from its path by using the equity powers of Federal courts to enforce the criminal law. If there is judicial power to declare the men's service, for the purpose of putting them into jail without a jury trial, a public service, there must be legislative power in the Congress deriving its power from the same Constitution to declare their service to be a "public service" for the purpose of safeguarding their lives and limbs from the dangers of that service.

The consent of the master is not necessary: In declaring unconstitutional the New York compensation act the New York Court of Appeals said:

"It (the act) does not affect the status at all, but writes into the contract between the employer and employee, without the consent of the former, a liability on his part which never existed before and to which he is permitted to interpose practically no defense, for he can only escape liability when the employee is injured through his own willful misconduct. That is a defense which needs no legislative sanction, since it would be abhorrent to the most primitive notions of justice to permit one to impose liability for his willfully self-inflicted injuries upon another who is wholly free from responsibility for them."

The attitude of the New York Court of Appeals is shown in the complete incapacity to see modern conditions of labor. It believes it has shown the absurdity of the modern ideas whereby relief is sought to be conferred from the stupid judge made rules of the common law when it states that a law would be declared unconstitutional by it "which would compel the industrial employers to give each employee a vacation on full pay during two months of every year." Why can not the modern legislature, as well as the old Babylonian exploiters of their brick-making slaves (the originators of that socialistic scheme of a sabbath), make an annual holiday with pay as valid as the courts can import into a contract of labor the unrequited throwing in of life and limbs? It just reduces itself to Abinger's, C. B., ruling that it would be "inconvenient"; that is, that it would decrease dividends and cut profits.

To return to the principal objection of that court, the railroad employees or any other laborers were not consulted about the doctrine of fellow servant or assumption of risk which the courts, on behalf of the master class, wrote into the contract of employment and which the Federal courts adopted, without leave of Congress, as the rule of awarding justice. There must be as much power in Congress to "write into the contract between employer and employee, without the consent of the master," a condition favoring the employee when, admittedly, conditions changed, as even the most reactionary courts admit, as there was for the courts to misinterpret economic conditions and to impose untold hardships and injustice on the laborers. Whenever the legislature happens to confirm some standard laid down by the courts—"no legislative sanction is needed"—the courts set their face against any change whereby the legislature attempts to undo some of the startling outrages against the social conscience of the times by setting up as taboo and unchangeable the dicta and the reasonings of courts which are illogical and have no foundation on anything save the arbitrary power of the last word. There is nothing apparently wrong in the courts writing into the contract of service the absurd and mendacious assumption of risk as a fiction to justify their exploitation of the men at risk, but it becomes a singularly mischievous attempt on the part of the legislature to shift the burden from the employee to the master. On this point it may be well to quote the Supreme Court in the famous Taylor case (210 U. S., at 296), where Moody, J., well said:

"Where an injury happens through the absence of a safe drawbar there must be hardship. Such an injury must be an irreparable misfortune to some one. If it must be borne entirely by him who suffers it, that is a hardship to him. If its burden is transferred, as far as it is capable of transfer, to the employer, it is a hardship to him. It is quite conceivable that Congress, contemplating the inevitable hardship of such injuries and hoping to diminish the economic loss to the community resulting from them, should deem it wise to impose their burdens upon those who could measurably control their causes instead of upon those who are, in the main, helpless in that regard. Such a policy would be intelligible." * * *

Applying this method of Mr. Justice Moody's reasoning to the changed condition of master and servant, when carried on (1) by corporations (subject to legislative control in respect of their contracts with any of their employees), (2) carrying on a public business (on a Federal mail route protected against violence and therefore subject to Federal regulation when operating over it), (3) for gain, paid for from public funds (in being permitted to haul passengers and express parcels and the mail, all of which might be carried by the United States under the post-roads clause of the Constitution), it is certainly within the power of Congress to classify the service as public and to thereby change the status or the relation of employees to their masters and to annex to the relation those modern concepts of equity which the courts have refused to import into the relation, for it follows that if the courts had power to declare the railroad man's service public service, to put him into jail for violating an agreement for personal service because of the character of his work, and, in the Arago case, to keep sailors in jail because of the peculiar character of the sailor's service with his ship and the public necessity of working the ship, then the Congress has the same power to classify the men as public servants and to impose liability on those corporations who voluntarily engage in mail carriage and commerce on mail routes. That must be conceded as a logical sequence under our system of division of powers.

If the character of the men's work is public service, there can be annexed to it whatever conditions Congress sees fit, so long as the conditions really are parts of that service, and the killing and maiming of men can be statistically demonstrated to be consequences of that service, and it must be as fully within the power of Congress to impose conditions, onerous though they be, against the waste of human lives as it was for that same Congress to grant away public lands in the aid of the same carriers. If the power of conferring benefits on a class and their use of these lands and taxes (for that is what, under the income-tax cases, the gifts of bonds amounts to) does not impose liabilities, there is no logic in the law. In this bill this reciprocal duty is sought to be imposed on the theory that, taking the benefit of Federal exemption from State legislation and claiming the protection of Federal justice for the protection of their bonds in receivership cases and in cases of labor disturbances, gives the right to the Congress to impose liabilities in respect of a more modern attitude toward their employees. In the Hale v. Henkel case it was held that there is a dual relationship of corporations engaged in interstate commerce. The United States, then, have the same right to change the status of the servant of these corporations as have the courts to administer what they claim is a general law of master and servant. The power of changing the status of the servant flows from his subjection to Federal law and the paramount legislative power of Congress over that subject; but in the employers' liability cases it was conceded by the majority that the relation of master and servant was, in the limited respects set forth therein, subject to congressional regulation, so that it merely reduces itself to the question whether the Supreme Court will state that changing the rule of decision is beyond congressional power when it legislatively declares a change in the status of the servant to be a public service and annexes to that changed status certain changed relations of liability.

The power of changing rules of evidence is inherent in Congress, so long as it does not upset the basic principle of "due process of law." The courts have for over 80 years misapplied the rules of evidence in construing into the relation of service the "assumption of risk and common employment" doctrine. These rules of law perpetuated fictions not found in fact, and excluded facts from the everyday life of the servants. And this exclusion of evidence is what every class does that has power and no social conscience.

The power of changing the rules of evidence must certainly be lodged in Congress, for the Federal courts have no intrinsic power of making that evidence what Congress declares shall not be evidence. The inferior Federal courts have only such power as Congress chooses to intrust them with in carrying out their granted powers. Evidence is a matter of procedure, and this is and always has been within the power of congressional regulation. The power of declaring what evidence shall be received and what facts shall be admitted are parts of the power of establishing inferior courts. And therefore Congress has the power of removing fictions imported by the courts and substituting modern concepts of professional risk, and these must be accepted by the courts if once written into an act.

There is nothing in the Federal Constitution to hinder the Congress from pursuing its own policy in regulating the social and civil condition of such persons as are, within the classes, given Federal citizenship by the fourteenth amendment, and are, within the classes, actually engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and are within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or that enjoins on the Congress the duty of maintaining the status of inferiority, or requires that those engaged in such commerce shall be held to be subjected to the rule of law whereby negligence is made a standard and whereby danger as a factor of causing injury is to be excluded.

The due-process clause of the Constitution, if in conflict with the later enacted fourteenth amendment, must give way, on the analogy of repeal or inconsistency of the two in the same subject matter. But there is no need of so arguing, as due process never was intended to prohibit the change of rules of evidence, and the exclusion of the rules of negligence from master and servant's cases and the substitution therefor of the actual facts by the rule of the danger or hazard is only changing the rules of what testimony shall in future be regarded as admissible evidence. That is certainly a purely legislative function, and to this change the courts must submit.

In the Lemmon case (20 N. Y.), on page 623, it is said:

"In incorporating the fugitive slave provision in the Constitution the Convention was careful not to do anything which should imply its sanction of slavery as legal. The provision as originally reported read 'legally held to service,' and it was amended by striking out the words 'legally held to service' and made to read 'held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof.' (See Journal, 384; Madison's Works, 1558, 1559.)

"So also the word 'service' was substituted for 'servitude' on motion of a delegate from Virginia, the latter being (624) descriptive of slaves. (3 Madison's Works, 1569.) The Federal Constitution treats slaves as persons and not as property, and it acts upon them as persons and not as property, though the latter character may be given to them by the laws of the States in which slavery is tolerated."

The fourteenth amendment went no further than to endow all persons within the subjection of the United States with a new status, leaving to Congress the details of elaborating the details thereof by adequate legislation based on the general powers of carrying into effect those granted powers. There can be no doubt that if the Constitution had not violated (and in law there is no fiction stronger than that of disregarding war or its incidents) the due-process clause of the original Constitution in breaking up the political status of black men, and in conferring on all nationals a new Federal citizenship, that then there must be power in that same Congress to changes the rules of evidence in actions brought for injuries on Federal highways, and to regulate the status of free men as parts of their national citzenship, and to require the courts in the future to disregard negligence as a criterion and to substitute therefor the more enlightened rule of the professional risk.

In the Lemmon case (20 N. Y.), at page 629, Wright, J., said:

"But, in 1841, the State, by actual legislation, abrogated the permission accorded to slavery during transit, and declared it to be her will that under all circumstances a slave voluntarily brought into the State should be free, and that the status should not be tolerated within her borders. It is for the State to establish the rule, * * * and not the courts in her behalf, and she may or may not as she chooses exercise it (comity). * * * It is the status, the unjust and unnatural relation, which the policy of the State aims to suppress, and her policy fails, at least in part, if the status be upheld at all. * * * The State deems that the public peace, her internal safety, and domestic interests require the total suppression of a social condition that violates the law of nature (Virginia Bill of Rights, 1, 15); a status declared by Lord Mansfield in Somerset's case to be 'of such a nature that it is incapable of being introduced on any reasons, moral or political'; that originates in the predominance of physical force, and is continued by the more predominance of social force." * * *

The United States have the right to determine the status or social and civil condition of their citizens, and of every condition of persons within their territory. This power of regulation of such a status is, it may be argued, derivable from the fourteenth amendment, whose opening words are:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."

If the Congress has no power under this direct political attribution of power to bring about a changed result from the status heretofore evolved by the courts, we have the curious result that the fourteenth amendment was potent to exempt corporations and aggregations of wealth from State regulations and laws meant to benefit laboring men as a class, and that the courts will say that Congress can not use the power from the same source to overcome the status impinged on laborers, and that due process of law means one thing for labor and another thing for the corporations. As was said in the Lemmon case (20 N. Y., at 617):

"It can not affect the question that at some time in her history as a colony or State she (New York) has tolerated slavery on her soil, or that the status has ever had a legal cognition; for without regard to time and circumstances, the State may at her will change the civil condition of her inhabitants and her domestic policy, and proscribe and prohibit that which before had existed."

From the brief of W. M. Evarts in the case of Lemmon v. People, in the court of appeals (20 N. Y., at 597), we copy the following on status:

"The status of slavery is not a natural relation, but contrary to nature, and at every moment it subsists it is an ever new and active violation of the law of nature. (Citing cases.)

"It originates in mere predominance of physical force, and is continued by mere predominance of social force or municipal law.

"Whenever and wherever the physical force in one stage, or the social force or municipal law in the other stage, fails, the status falls, for it has nothing to rest on.

"To continue and defend the status, then, within our territory, the stranger must appeal to some municipal force." * * *

Charles O'Conner had on behalf of the respondent to the habeas corpus proceedings well stated the reason for exploitation. In his brief (p. 575) he said:

"Who shall deny the claim of the intellectual white race to its compensation for the mental toil of governing and guiding the negro laborer? The learned and skillful statesman, soldier, physician, preacher, or other expert in any great department of human exertion where mind holds dominion over matter, is clothed with power and surrounded with materials for the enjoyment of mental and physical luxuries in proportion to the measure of his capacity and attainments. And all this at the cost of the mechanical and agricultural laborer, to whom such enjoyments are denied. If the social order, founded in the different natural capacities of individuals in the same family, which produces these inequalities is not unjust, who can rightfully say of the like inequality in condition between races differing in capacity that it is contrary to a law of nature, or that the governing race who conform to it are guilty of fraud and rapine, or that they commit a violence to right reason which is forbidden by morality?"

Denio, C. J., in the opinion state (p. 603):

"So that whatever opinion we might entertain as to the reasonableness or policy, or even the moral obligation, of the nonslave-holding States to establish provisions similar to those stricken out of the Revised Statutes, it is not in our power, while administering the laws of this State in one of its tribunals of justice, to act at all upon these sentiments, when we see, as we can not fail to do, that the legislature has deliberately repudiated them."

SOCIOLOGICAL ARGUMENT.

In this connection we maintain that there can be demonstrated from numerous authors that the received views about "consent of the governed," "freedom of choice of occupation," and "freedom of contract," and the allied "assumption of risk," are historically unsound, and that, so far as they have been used against workmen, they are, to quote one court, "heartless mockery," or else are simply means of justifying class domination in the class state in perpetual contradiction to the theory upheld by the court, when they are using the sharp edge of the sword of state against the workers, as in the Debs case (158 U. S., 581).

Let us begin with simple concepts, such as the State. This is and always has been a political device of the ruling class or group, having for its object the economic exploitation of a subject class or group. (Gumplowis, Die soziologische Staatsidee, etc.)

Second. The constitution of the State (whether written or traditional) or form of political domination which the ruling class or group imposes on the subject, class, or group varies with the self-restraint exercised by the subject, class, or group.

(And this is true, although the economically or politically exploited class or group have acquired certain political rights, such as liberty of movement or, in advanced economic States, even certain political rights, but no property worth mentioning, when, as a matter of fact, it is property that it is the principal care of the dominant group to safeguard.)

Third. The self-restraint of the subject, class, or group depends upon or is determined by the collective intelligence of such group or class and its consequent ability to understand the character of the characteristics of the State and the motives of the dominant class in its constitution.

Fourth. The laws enforced by the ruling group or class through the instrumentalities of the State (by whatever formalism these may be obscured) will be determined by the character of the self-restraint of the subject, group, or class and by the ability of the ruling class to justify its scheme of economic exploitation by group conclusion concerning its class interests.

Point one.—Since, then, under our system of government the workmen have to be consulted about the character of the persons in the Congress or the Presidency and do not have any voice in the selection of those placed on the Federal bench, save by a very indirect method of shifted responsibility, the governing group, in this age of bond-holding and bankers' class, quite as apparently as in the last generation, the slavocracy will and can enforce their desire to have the benefits of the unrequited loss of life and limb of those at risk. Heretofore they have had quite as efficient aid from the Supreme Court in this generation, and the same flimsy justification was advanced in their behalf as was more boldly stated by the Supreme Court in the line of cases beginning with the Antelope (10 Wheat., 66) and ending with the Dred Scott case (19 How., 393). Marshall, Chief Justice, in the Antelope (10 Wheat., at p. 114) used the following language:

"In examining claims of this momentous importance, claims in which the sacred rights of liberty and property come in conflict with each other, * * * this court must not yield to feelings which might seduce it from the path of duty and must obey the mandate of the law. However abhorrent this (slave) traffic may be to a mind whose * * * feelings are not blunted by familiarity with the practice, it has been sanctioned in modern times by the laws of all nations who possess distant colonies, each of whom has engaged in it as a common commercial business which no other could rightfully interrupt. It has claimed all the sanction which could be derived from long usage and general acquiescence."

Again, on page 121, he says:

"Among the most enlightened nations of antiquity one of these (rules) was that the victor might enslave the vanquished. This, which was the usage of all, could not be pronounced repugnant to the law of nations, which is certainly to be tried by the test of general usage. That which has received the assent of all must be the law of all.

"Slavery, then, has its origin in force; but as the world has agreed that it is a legitimate result of force, the state of things which is thus produced by general consent can not be pronounced unlawful."

So this great expositor of the Constitution! For his generation and for all who believed in the exploitation of black men, the very incarnation of wisdom and good policy. In what does the standpoint advocated by him, and since the economic futility of his arguments has been demonstrated, it has become fashionable to cavil with his logic, differ from that still maintained by the advocates of the maintenance of the barbaric, inept, and antisocial rules of the law of master and servant?

There is no possible excuse for slavery that does not with precisely the same inexorable logic make for their retention. The rules advocated and enforced by the courts in master and servants law are of quite as much historical, juristic, and we may add, political, probative force, as had the wise theory of justification enunciated by the great Chief Justice. Historically, servants of all classes, were until comparatively recently, either the actual property, or else so dependent economically and socially upon their bread masters that they had few, if any, rights that these were bound to respect. And this was portrayed in the decisions of the courts. The political element—that is, the conscious intent to continue the unrequited exploitation, as far as it would permit such exploitation to go on—has been supplied by the American courts as the residuum of arbitrary power, which arbitrary power, here as elsewhere, is wielded in behalf of those groups who have dominance in economic power, or, in other words, are the de facto state.

There is a pathetic and ghastly element in our situation brought about by the mockery of the putative freedom which these same courts use to mock the victims of the industrial disasters. Because the political rights of freedom of locomotion, and because of the economic needs of factory life have made the workmen participants in the ordinary exemptions of police regulations used elsewhere to cow the laborers, we have blindly allowed the courts to impute a liberty that which does not exist, to maintain a disastrous fiction of freedom of choice, whereby we either stupidly or criminally excuse the exploitation of the laborers, in the interests of the stockholders and their allies.

That there is a point of difference between the capacity of containing this modern exploitation by the courts and that formerly justified before the conscience of the slave owners in this: That the workmen are persons who have before them other ideals and have knowledge of the remedies worked out elsewhere for their relief. Those mistake the temper of our times if they think that the continued acquiescence of the victims of judicial inept rules will continue to remain silent and will permit a game of battledore and shuttlecock of courts blaming legislatures and legislatures pointing out how the courts whittle away relief sought to be conferred upon the victims of modern industry. The American workmen are growing weary of protestations, and their widows are increasing, their orphans are being degraded in life's handicap. Relief must be brought soon and should be had without economic or social upheavals.

In the last instance, it is merely a question of dividends of the railroads and all fictitious anxiety about the constitutionality of the proposed legislation can well await the final decision of the Supreme Court, which will take whatever measure of placating the most potent influence. That what it must in the order of things do, and, being a part of the political mechanism of domination, it is quite as much subject to those influences of the spirit of the time as is any Member of the Congress or any other person in political life.

When certain fundamental rules of century-old constitutional law can be upset by the voice of one man (and the dissenting opinions of the judges in the income-tax cases show how bitterly they themselves stated the radical judicial legislation exercised by the majority in those cases)—argument against socialism is not reason per se. In dissenting from the majority in the income tax cases, Harlan, J., said (158 U. S., at 674): "This court has been urged to stand in the breach for the protection of the just rights of property against the advancing hosts of socialism. With the policy of legislation of this character, this court has nothing to do. That is for the legislative branch of the Government. It is for Congress to determine whether the necessities of the Government are to be met, or the interests of the people subserved, by the taxation of incomes. With that determination, so far as it rests upon grounds of expediency or public policy, the courts can have no rightful concern. The safety and permanency of our institutions demand that each department of government shall keep within its legitimate sphere as defined by the supreme law of the land." And again on page 679: "Is the judiciary to supervise the action of the legislative branch of the Government upon questions of public policy? Are they to override the will of the people, as expressed by their chosen servants, because in their judgment, the particular means employed by Congress in execution of the powers conferred by the Constitution are not the best that could have been devised, or are not absolutely necessary to accomplish the objects for which the Government was established?"—our duty becomes lighter by so much as we endeavor to remedy the evils that the courts brought into being and apply justice that they have refused to award because in cases of employees they could not overturn their own precedents, even though the ablest of them recognized their want of logic or elementary justice.

The same court that has upheld assumption of risk, in cases of a switchman stepping into an unblocked frog, as a simple device of relieving a powerful railroad company from paying damages, by a showing of lack of logic that would have disgraced a schoolboy (Seley case, 152 U. S., 145), had in the previous generation, when under the economic domination of the slave lords, spoken of the acquiescence of the slaves (The Antelope, 10 Wheaton, 114) as a reason for their position, and had then earned quite the same applause that the opinions in the Employers' Liability cases (207 U. S.), in our day were received at the hands of those who had to gain from the continuance of the exploitation of the railroad men. Let us examine whether the term exploitation, as applied to the rules of the common law as evolved, administered, and justified and distinguished by the courts in each such case, is properly called exploitation.

There are two forms of labor, and only two—political and economic. Economic labor is the work done and the exchange thereof for the labor of others, by economic desires and hopes of satisfying wants.

Political labor is the result of force, which, at the moment, is irresistible, and which must be submitted to by the victim, and which force or power the person in power can exert. The limitation, which the controlling group exercises may extend from absolute slavery (such as accompanied the development of the State, in its sorrowful progress through the ages), down to unjust class rules. In principle, however, it is always the same. There is an ever-advancing line of delimination, below which man will not be pushed back. Economics bring about the need of extra exploitation, and then there comes a crash. Such were the Jacqueries in France, in Lombardy, in England, and in the great Peasants' War of 1522, and those of the Russian peasants at the time of the French Revolution, and our War of 1861—then the Mexican revolution of to-day. The principle in each and every case was identical; there was a little too much exploitation; that is, unrequited labor, enforced by the mechanism of the dominant group.

In modern industrial conditions laboring men and women must work with machinery not owned by them. They, as a matter of fact, have nothing to say about their fellow employees. Nor have they the right or capacity to order machinery owned by their masters to be either repaired, improved, or in case of need discarded, and yet, when by a perfectly mathematical, ever-recurring statistical ratio one or the other is killed or maimed, they are met by the juristic twaddle about the assumption of risk as a heartless mockery of their sufferings, and told that this is American justice to its workers. One actual tale of recent wrong: Brinkmeier, who, after years of litigation was nonsuited and whose case was finally written by the Kansas Supreme Court, had lost his leg (105 Pac., 221; 93 Pac., 621), because it was cheaper for the Missouri Pacific Railway Co. to escape damages or compensation than to maintain its couplers in operative condition of safety; after the loss of his leg Brinkmeier entered a planing mill.

On the very morning on which counsel for the railroad company were trying (and succeeding) in keeping him from obtaining any damages, while the courts were again wrangling with his case, he lost his four fingers of his right hand in that planing mill. What does this man with a family of small children care about what reason is given for the exploitation of his efforts in life? In any walk of life open to him he meets the same dangers, and the courts claim such a man voluntarily assumes the risk of his calling. That is plainly exploiting his humanity for the benefit of those who placed in power the judges. Nothing can alter nor displace the ultimate verdict of unbiased thought in such a relation. The State, by its courts, claim that laboring men, as they are politically able to do for their services, are by the courts coerced, through a fiction created and fostered by them, to throw in for good measure their lives and limbs or else starve. This is cold-blooded coercion far more odious than the slavery of the blacks, for that slavery rested on the facts of force of a strong race over its barbaric subjects, imported like cattle, for the very purpose of being exploited without let or hindrance, while exploitation, for 80 years patiently borne by American workmen, is justified by unfairness and false logic, and thus is antisocial in its effects upon all who partake of the exploitation, for whatever purpose created or maintained.

Exploitation, then, is the unrequited labor of those under the political domination of a superior group. And to those who are damnified by the process of exploitation it matters not whether they are called "fellow citizens" about election time and cast upon the scrap heap of the industrial unfit after an accident, or whether they are, in name as well as in fact, slaves. The method of justifying the exploitation may differ, but the fact of the unrequited labor being used for the benefit of those owning the industries is the same, and no mere label of "common employment" or of "assumption of risk" can change this fact. The money that should be spent, as it is spent in every other industrial country having railroads, in taking care of the dependents of those killed or injured, is handed over to the stockholders, who thus claim a vested right to the blood money. Since thereby the standard of human life becomes a factor of lessening values, the management is encouraged in killing and maiming, because the only cost which the stockholders must pay is repair to rolling stock, while the railroad employees "assume the risk of their occupation," and if this is too dangerous for them all they have to do is to quit, only to be mangled in some other enterprise. This is certainly exploitation, and when courts of justice justify, it becomes nothing less than a cruel mockery.

In the Insular cases (182 U. S., 274), Brown, J., spoke ironically of the attempt of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case to definitely set at rest the questions based on economic differences of slavery. And there is no doubt that some future Supreme Court will treat with the same lack of respect the false reasoning and brutal class justification shown in the Lochner New York bakers case or in the Adair case. It is our function to fashion statutes as best we may, to follow the past rules of the Supreme Court as the great and final board of review of our political activities, as we might that of a coordinate body, if you will, but there is a limit where legislative independence ceases when we do not enact a bill because, forsooth, the Supreme Court may declare our work unconstitutional. They may do so at any time, and that is no reason for this body to abdicate its functions to the court.

Point two: The Constitution of the United States has ever since the Civil War become the mechanism of enhancing the power of those whom it is convenient to speak of as the bond-holding class. The amendments designed to give political power and freedom to the enfranchised blacks were used to batter down State legislation designed to benefit the working classes, and in so doing previous rules about noninterference with State legislation were set at naught, and the same courts that could find no warrant for sustaining the enlightened legislation for workmen in the employer's liability cases found in the word "persons" in the fourteenth amendment authority to extend the power of corporations to such an extent that in Hale v. Henkel they were forced to call a halt to corporate lawlessness, after having in Smith v. L. S. & M. S. R. R. Co. (173 U. S., 694) held that the creature of the State, a mere railroad company, could of its own free will do what the legislature could not force it to do.

The steady desire of State after State to pass laws to exempt their inhabitants from the domination of Federal courts shows a general unrest and distrust of the fairness of these courts, which, from its universality, must be capable of generalization. And that this feeling is not without its economic foundation in the cases where workmen are involved is shown by the fact that it was the Senate that inserted into the amendment to the second employers' liability act (H. R. 17263, approved Apr. 5, 1910) the rule that cases begun in a State court under that act should not be removable into the Federal court. Had there not been a strong feeling about this matter, it could not have been put through so easily as it was.

Wherever there is exploitation there is—there is bound to be—resentment; and this is a force of evil in the State. Wise statesmen, and to the extent that the courts are participants of political power, protecting property as their first aim (see Harlan's (J.) dictum in Monongahela Bridge Co. v. United States, 216 U. S., 177, and compare it with Story's dictum "that government can scarcely be deemed to be free where the rights of property are left solely dependent upon the will of a legislative body without any restraint" in Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Peters, 627, 70 years ago), give heed to these rumblings so as not to place themselves in a position where retreat with dignity is cut off. For no man anxious of his posthumous reputation, as is any judge whose opinions will be read by each generation of lawyers, cares to be classed among those who, having eyes, see not the things that are obviously manifest in the spirit of the times.

And then there is a force in suppressed resentment when workmen come to realize, as they must, that all improvements of learning are applied to every phase of legal inquiry, and only when their bodily injuries and the measure of toll to be paid for their lives are involved, that then alone they are met with a series of sophisms and precedents, while when property interests are involved, as they were in the income-tax cases, no precedents could keep the court from overturning century-old law and decision to read into the Constitution a specially exempted class of property. It must surely have struck all thoughtful students of the law as a very remarkable coincidence that we legislators, whether in State or National legislatures, never show greater ineptitude than in drafting legislation designed to take off the backs of those exploited some grievous wrong, as is all so-called labor legislation when viewed from an enlarged standpoint. And Bulletin No. 91 (Nov., 1910) of the Bureau of Labor shows quite an amazing mass of labor legislation declared unconstitutional, and always justified by a string of dicta and extracts from the opinions of the Supreme Court.

If, then, we must come to understand that there stands a body opposed to letting us relieve the fair name of our civilization from the reproach of being far behind cultured and civilized States in industrial legislation, and if we refuse or fail to act there will inevitably arise an aggregation of men soon powerful enough to demand a change.

Point three. There is abroad in the land to-day an all but universal recognition that we must get rid of the archaic class laws enunciated by the courts in the defense of property rights even though the lives and limbs of the men at risk suffered. This is shown in the autocratically organized trades. Where either the trust is absolute, economically, or where for the sake of holding upright its character as a benevolent feudalism, as in the case of some industries like the Harvesters or the Electric Trust or the Steel Trust mills, it concedes, as a matter of grace, to those injured in its employ that there is no justice in the law as enforced in American courts between master and servant. And yet sociology, or science of human interrelations, has been read to little account if this sort of paternal kindness at the breaking point of the laborers' endurance ever helped a tottering cause or delayed the unavoidable day of reckoning for the exploiters. As State legislature after State legislature passes ameliorative laws, and the courts in their blind incapacity to fathom the spirit of their times, save from the viewpoint of Moody's Manual, declares such legislation unconstitutional because not in harmony with Hamilton's Constitution of 1787, does it not begin to dawn upon the mentality that sooner or later others will take our places and carry out the needed reforms?

For it is economic needs and interests and not fine phrases that bring about political differences and groupings, and those that can not see beyond their day and generation should not be in the position of inflicting harm upon future generations by making for a smash instead of for a gradual change for betterments. So long as the dominant idea of protecting property rights at all hazards as cynically outspoken as the dictum of Harlan, J., in Monongahela Bridge Co. v. The United States (217 U. S.), is the standard of judicial right-mindedness and is used at all times as a bat to knock out any attempted relief from archaic laws or abused powers, so surely there will crystallize the consciousness that there is no hope within the outworn Constitution and demagogues will find ready listeners. The courts that can justify protective tariff and bounties to capitalist groups and "reasonable" trusts stand aghast at the idea of tardily awarding justice to those maimed in industrial warfare, because it would be, to quote Lord Abinger, "inconvenient" to pay for the maimed employees. And yet the English have repudiated the logic and justification of the continuation of this grievous wrong. Surely no one imagines that the American worker, and least of all the highly organized and ever efficient railroad men, have less political capacity or knowledge of what their interests demand than the British workers.

There is breaking dawn in the minds of the worker that the courts are the cause of the efficient and most selfish group control, viz, a plutocracy, without traditions and organized under legal guises so well fitted to eliminate any personal responsibility, that they have taken the consequence of the power of electing judges to mean that they will have the power of recalling tools of corporation greed or ineffective followers of precedents when opposed to modern ideas. What has been spreading throughout the West will in due time become a desired scheme of reforming the Federal judiciary, and unless there is a timely house cleaning and brushing away of the mass of unholy mediæval class justification there is bound to come a strong call for that reform.

Point four. So long as the courts, the highest social forces of restraint in the State of our industrial democracy, had slaves of an alien race, in a political lack of status to deal with—the brutal truths of the civil law needed very little justification, because of the incapacity of the exploited beings to resent the iniquity and because they had no other standards. Not so with the modern workmen. Although they are beginning to recognize that they, too, are slaves, self-imported into the steel mills and mines and nests of tracks in railroad yards to replenish the hordes of laborers required to carry on the industrial development of our lands, and a State which must go through all the vicissitudes of all maritime States, and either import slaves or exploit those self-imported masses of men into a condition analogous to wage slavery and differing from political slavery only in indifferent matters, yet there is this distinction to be noted that they have political rights and are beginning to exert them to unify their class interests as opposed to the acquiescent attitude so long drilled into them as the ideal state of mind of the laborer.

The old method of justification is passing away, and even the liberty of contract, so dear to the heart of a court that it could legalize blacklisting in the Adair case and encourage overworking bakers in Lochners's case by false analogies and mistaken readings of medical reports about tuberculosis among them, will not again be used to batter down legislation sought to better men's condition. And as there is no decent reason for the courts to stand alone in upholding that as a standard of reasoning which the entire industrial civilized world has discarded as inept, mendacious, and unfair, the chances are that any act that shows a decent attempt to comply with the mandates of constructive legislation, based on their rulings, will be allowed to pass muster.

Men with a decent regard for their future reputation do not care to be left in the position of saying that it is good law to perpetuate a state of things which could make Judge Caldwell in a minority opinion not approved of by the Supreme Court say, as he did say of his colleagues on the Circuit Court of Appeals (121 Fed., 16 Kilpatrick case): "Whenever it is made to appear to a railroad company that it costs more to pay the damages assessed against it by the verdicts of juries for maintaining a dangerous condition of its tracks or appliances than it would cost to substitute safe ones in their place the substitution is quickly made; but as long as courts hold as matter of law that what the witnesses in this case declare to be 'simply a death trap' may be maintained with impunity and without incurring any pecuniary liability, the death trap will remain and the slaughter go on. The decision of the majority of the court makes human life in this circuit a cheaper commodity than lumber." (Kilpatrick case, 121 Fed. Rep., 16.)

In that case the railroads won, but class interests that require such Pyrrhic victories are in a bad way. If this dictum of that great judge was bad law, the courts that affirmed the majority and not the dissenting judge are branded before posterity. That sort of justification can not stand the test of time. Nor can the cunning sophistry used in justifying the "assumption of risk," so elaborately worked out by Sanborn, C. J., in the Miller case (123 Fed.), in future stand. The disapprobation of the whole civilized world is a factor to be reckoned with, even when the men at risk are politically powerless, which they are not in these United States. And that is another and an important factor. But these cumulative factors are within the knowledge of the Supreme Court so keenly and appreciated so well that there is in my mind no doubt that the socialogical insight of the Supreme Court will prompt it to give potency to an act as carefully thought out and well worded as is my bill. On that point I have no hesitancy whatever. Your duty and mine ends when we have done what we constitutionally may. The factors of deciding and censoring our work is committed to others.

In the foregoing it has been shown that every argument which can be set forth against a limited compensation bill has been answered. It remains to consider how far the draft, known as H. R. 9831, introduced May 18, 1911, is constitutional. That bill provides for freedom of contract and for due process of law to both carrier and to employee; it taxes those carriers who do not accept its provisions, and permits reviews by the courts of such questions as are properly subjects of judicial cognizance.

It comprehensively states the amounts of compensation to be awarded, and is, it is submitted, the first exhaustive attempt to codify the whole law for the compensation of those hourly at risk in railroad service.

It does not attempt to do more than serve as a model for any legislation that may be hereafter enacted to extend its principle to other occupations subject to Federal control.

This I compiled because at that time every railroad attorney maintained that Congress had not jurisdiction to enact this legislation, while they also maintained that no bill providing for workmen's compensation could be drafted which would be constitutional. In my argument I believe I have demonstrated that Congress has the jurisdiction and that the bill I prepared and for which I have fought was so drafted that there could not have been any question of its constitutionality.

Lastly I wish to insert my arguments against the bill now under consideration, made before the Judiciary Committee on June 7, 1912, which were responsible for a great many amendments to the original commission bill as passed by the Senate:

STATEMENT OF HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH, MEMBER OF CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, being the originator of the workman-compensation discussions and also of the legislation which is pending before this committee at the present time, I deem it important to appear before this committee.

At the time I introduced my first workman-compensation bill I was inclined to believe that the railroads of this country did not look upon it with a great deal of favor. In fact, they have charged that this was a revolutionary step and that my bill was a revolutionary measure.

Therefore I was very much amused when I learned recently that all of the railroad attorneys are now favoring the commission-prepared workman-compensation bill. At the time I introduced my workman-compensation bill I did desire to provide real compensation to employees who were injured or killed, and their dependents, and not to relieve the railroads from any liabilities or large judgments, as this bill aims to do.

Mr. STERLING. Is your bill limited to railroads?

Mr. SABATH. My first bill was limited to railroads, but all my other bills that I have introduced applied to persons employed in any occupation subject to the regulative power of Congress, including mail routes.

I may as well say now that the first bill I introduced was on February 5, 1908, H. R. 6061; H. R. 16739 following on February 10, 1908; the third, H. R. 24339, being introduced by me on December 16, 1908; the next, January 6, 1909, H. R. 25408; the next, known as H. R. 1, on March 15, 1909, on which I received a hearing after many requests, which hearing brought about the introduction of a resolution and the appointment of a commission to investigate the principles of workman compensation. Subsequently, on May 3, 1910, I introduced another bill, H. R. 25334, which I thought was an improvement upon all the former bills. In the Sixty-second Congress I introduced, on April 10, 1911, H. R. 2972, and on May 18, 1911, H. R. 9831.

After the commission prepared its draft I redrafted my bill again and have introduced a bill, H. R. 21962. In none of these bills, however, did I attempt to take away from the employees any rights or privileges that they possessed. The last two bills are drafted on a principle which will leave to the employees the right to choose to receive their present rights under the common and statutory laws, or privileges which may be gained under my compensation act; in other words, it is elective.

I desire to say that at the time I introduced my first compensation bills all the defenses—such as fellow servant, assumed risk, and contributory negligence—were still in force in all of the actions in suits for personal injury by injured employees; and it was nearly impossible for anyone to recover. Since that time, however, as you know, nearly all of the defenses have been removed, and I agree with the statement, made by Senator SUTHERLAND and the other gentlemen of the commission, that under the present conditions over 50 per cent of the employees injured will be able to recover as against the former 20 per cent.

Some of the gentlemen who have preceded me stated that before the defenses had been removed it cost the railroads $10,000,000 annually and that under this bill it would cost them $15,000,000, or $5,000,000 more than before, tending to show how liberally they provided for those unfortunates in this bill; but, Mr. Chairman, if 150 per cent more injured employees will be able to recover than under the present laws, it would mean that the railroads would be obliged to pay about $25,000,000 annually for damages. They themselves, however, stated that under the proposed commission act that they are endeavoring to force through they will be obliged to pay about $15,000,000—an indirect admission that this benevolent bill would save them about $10,000,000 each and every year.

Mr. Chairman, that was not what I intended to do when I started to advocate workman-compensation legislation. My aim in securing workman compensation has been to aid legislation and assist those who are killed or injured by eliminating litigation and changing the risk and responsibility from employee to employer, he being in a better position to bear it. After I introduced my bill (H. R. 1), and even before that, I sent to all the railroad organizations and all other labor organizations and unions and to all the newspapers and labor magazines several statements and articles about my bill, in which I endeavored to show the great benefit that would accrue to the people injured and how many hardships eliminated if my bill and the principle underlying my bill be adopted.

I have continued to advocate workman-compensation legislation, and I am of the opinion, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that a great many organizations to-day and a great many people of this country are under the impression that the commission bill that has been reported, or the Senate bill that has been passed, is a bill that is drafted after my compensation bill, providing cumulative and elective remedy. I venture to say that many organizations and a good percentage of the laboring people of this country are under the impression that they will have in this bill such law as I have advocated, and which will provide compensation, eliminate litigation, and that they will in all cases, when injured, receive a fair compensation without years of delay and without litigation.

* * * Mr. Chairman, I shall now, with your kind indulgence, give my views on the bill and point out its defects and jokers and explain why I did not and do not now approve of the bill now before you. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the principle, but I am not in favor of this bill, because it takes away at one stroke from the people whom I aim to assist the present remedy, the present protection and relief which Congress gave them when the liability law of 1908 and 1910 was adopted.

We now know what law they have, as the Supreme Court only a few days ago declared the 1910 act constitutional, and do not know what they are receiving in this compensation bill, because no one can tell what the Supreme Court will hold. And for that reason we should not at one stroke eliminate all the present liability laws as they now stand. It took England over 20 years of litigation before they ascertained what some of the provisions in their workman-compensation law actually meant and how they should be construed, and no one can tell how long it will take our courts to do so. Furthermore, England never made its act exclusive, as is aimed to be done here.

I am in favor of a workman-compensation bill.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Do I understand you are in favor of the principle of compensation because under any negligence liability law there will be a large class that will not get any compensation unless you do have a compensation law?

Mr. SABATH. That was and is the main reason why I favor workman compensation. I have been on the bench for 12 years. During that time I had hundreds of cases before me of unfortunate people, and in a majority of the cases I investigated I found that the cause of the misery and trouble to be due to the fact that the breadwinner of the family had been killed or injured and that no provision had been made by him or the corporation in whose employ he was injured for those who were dependent upon him, and he or they were precluded and prevented from recovering any damages or securing any relief or obtaining any assistance from the employer or corporation which was responsible for such injury, as the law, as it was construed then by our judges under a judge-made law, placed all of the responsibility on the employee for the protection of the employer.

That was the reason which set me thinking about the injustice that prevailed in all these cases, and I came to the conclusion that there ought to be a change in our laws. I started to study the German and English liability laws and in that way I came very soon after I came to Congress to introduce the first workman-compensation bill. Notwithstanding that I am in favor of a workman-compensation bill, and notwithstanding that I believe such a bill would do a great deal of good and would take care of all those who are injured, I am of the opinion that this bill that has been recommended by the commission and passed by the Senate and is now being considered by you, is not just nor fair to these hundreds of thousands of employees nor to their dependents, as it does not provide for reasonable compensation. They now have a much better chance to recover than they did at the time I introduced my first bill and even better since I have introduced my last one, as the Supreme Court has since that time declared the 1910 act constitutional.

They have a chance now to recover, as has been stated, at least in 50 per cent of the cases, where formerly they could recover only in about 15 per cent of the cases. I agree with some gentlemen when they state that they did receive only about 40 per cent. Yes, I am of the opinion that they have not received more than 30 per cent of the actual amount that was expended in any litigated case.

Mr. HOWLAND. You mean not recovered?

Mr. SABATH. No; I mean of the amounts that were actually paid by the railroads in taking care of the litigated cases, namely, for the cost of their own lawyers and the cost of investigations and the cost of the defense and all other costs on the part of the railroad and such injured employees.

Mr. MORRIS. You mean, as I understand it, that for every dollar that it cost the railroad company, that the railroad company paid, the real injured person only got 30 cents?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; that is what I mean. And really, if we would have the true figures it would not even reach that percentage or that amount.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you think so?

Mr. SABATH. I am absolutely certain.

Mr. FLOYD. But you include the expense incurred by the railroad company?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. MCCOY. In other words, you do not mean that out of the amount recovered because of a judgment only 30 per cent was received by the employee?

Mr. SABATH. Oh, no, I do not; because I believe the railroad companies have expended between 25 and 30 per cent, and perhaps up to 35 per cent, to investigate and defend these actions with a view of defeating them. The other 35 to 45 per cent were and are expended on the part of the plaintiff for attorneys' fees, court and witnesses' fees, etc.

Mr. NORRIS. But you put them all together when you show the burden that somebody has to bear?

Mr. SABATH. No; trying to show the amount of waste under the old law.

Mr. NORRIS. Absolutely.

Mr. SABATH. Another reason I am in favor of a compensation law, although I can not support this particular measure, as I have stated, is it is much easier now than formerly to recover, and recover much larger amounts in a much larger number of cases. The railroads know this, and for that reason settle cases that formerly they would not even consider, and agree to better settlements. But still we have more litigation than we should have. I believe that under this bill litigation will not be lessened, and, no doubt, will cost as much as it did under the old conditions, and the only thing which will be accomplished will be that an injured employee will, if successful, recover not more than is provided in the schedule, and the amounts in the schedule are so unreasonably low that if such injured employee be able to litigate, as he will be obliged to do in a great many instances, there will be nothing left to him, even if he succeeds.

Mr. NORRIS. Do you find objection to the bill outside of the fact that the schedule is too low?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I do. I think the bill is badly—well, no; the bill is too cleverly drawn, and notwithstanding the great ability of the gentlemen who represented the House on the commission, I am obliged to say that the gentlemen who represented the other side of the House, with the gentlemen who were placed on the commission for the railroads, have outmaneuvered our members of the commission. The reason I say this is, there are so many defects in that bill, and each and every such defect in some way will operate against the injured employees and lessen their chances to recover, or be entitled to compensation.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I would like to have you point out.

Mr. SABATH. I will try to do so to the best of my ability.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Without, of course, replying to your criticism of the bill, would it change the situation any if you knew that the representative of the railroads on the commission, Mr. Brown, was able to attend only three or four meetings of the commission?

Mr. SABATH. But he appointed a gentleman to take his place who was there, whenever even you could not be there, to look after the railroad interest; a man who has devoted a great deal of time and study to this proposition, and whom I consider the shrewdest of all the claim agents that the railroads have in this country.

Mr. BRANTLEY. You refer to Mr. Whiting?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir; to Mr. Whiting.

Mr. BRANTLEY. You think he rather overreached the balance of the commission?

Mr. SABATH. I believe he did. I think he took advantage of the fact that you sometimes were obliged to be away, or sometimes while studying some other section he slipped over a section which to you appeared to be perfectly proper and to which you did not have the time to object or did not really have the time to examine properly.

Mr. BRANTLEY. If you knew that the commission debated every word that went in that bill and wrote and rewrote and rewrote it, would that make any difference in your opinion about what Mr. Whiting did?

Mr. SABATH. If that is the case, then I am obliged to say that you have tried to draft a bill more favorable to the railroads than to the employees.

Mr. BRANTLEY. I just want to get it clear.

Mr. SABATH. I am trying to be as honest as I can.

Mr. NORRIS. Would that remark apply to the representatives of labor on the commission? Do you think they were looking after the railroads rather than the employees?

Mr. SABATH. Judge NORRIS, were you not here when Senator REED made his statement?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I did not hear Senator REED. I had to go away.

Mr. SABATH. If you had been here, you would not ask me the question, because he has so ably illustrated that proposition that I would be embarrassed to attempt to follow him and explain the reason why labor at the present time, or some of the labor organizations, are satisfied with the draft of the bill. I believe that he made it perfectly clear that the labor representative on the commission, not being a lawyer and having no experience in drafting bills, was no match for the clever Mr. Whiting.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, in referring to the House representative on that commission, Mr. BRANTLEY, you say first that he must not have been there, and if he was there and discussed it, then it must have been an attempt to help the railroads. I wanted to know if the same thing applied to the representative of organized labor who was on that commission?

Mr. SABATH. I think the organized-labor representative had been hypnotized or mesmerized in some way.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, not being on the commission and only being on this committee with the desire of doing what is right, I have listened to Mr. Gompers, I have heard the labor men, those who have been for and those who have been against it; I heard Senator SMITH speak against it to-day, and it has never occurred to me, and it seems to me you are going quite far to charge here that those men are doing anything except their best.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, I do not say that they did not do the best they could.

Mr. NORRIS. I think you insinuated something to that effect.

Mr. SABATH. I regret that I am obliged to make these statements, but the bill is so drafted as to be in every important provision favorable and beneficial to the railroads.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; others have made that statement, and you have a right to make that remark as to them. But I do not believe anything has occurred to intimate that Mr. BRANTLEY, for instance, was there on that commission desiring to——

Mr. SABATH (interposing). I do not desire to charge Mr. BRANTLEY or any member of the commission.

Mr. NORRIS. We all have a right to our opinion, and I think it has been conceded thus far that all these men were doing the very best they could.

Mr. BRANTLEY. You are aware of the fact, Judge SABATH, that Mr. Stone and Mr. Garretson and Mr. Lee each one congratulated and thanked the members of the commission for the fairness that they had shown to labor in this matter. That is a matter of public record.

Mr. SABATH. When you say so, of course I take it for granted that they did so. But personally I am still of the opinion that they are not acquainted with all of the provisions of this bill. I am inclined to believe that if they would study the provisions of the bill and if they would understand each and every section of the bill, they could not recommend it to their organizations and be satisfied with it.

Mr. HIGGINS. What provisions of the bill do you think the House members of the commission do not understand?

Mr. SABATH. I do not say they do not understand the provisions of the bill, but merely desire to say that the gentlemen who were there representing the railroads succeeded in convincing them and inserting provisions that are more favorable to the railroads than to the employees.

Mr. HIGGINS. What are they?

Mr. SABATH. I will try to give them to you. If you desire me to go over the bill, I will do so.

Mr. MCCOY. Which bill have you there?

Mr. SABATH. I have the Senate bill now in my hand which is now pending before this committee.

Mr. Chairman, in the first place, the bill provides for exclusive remedy, taking away from each and every injured or killed employee rights that he has under the present liability law and gives him a law of which we are not certain as to its constitutionality—taking away a certain for an uncertain remedy.

I have for several years in my humble way endeavored to prove and show to Congress, various committees, and to the people in general that it was within the power of Congress to pass a workman compensation bill that would be constitutional. The first two years, with only one exception, every railroad attorney thought I was wrong and that no bill could be drafted on the lines proposed by me and be constitutional. I was not wrong, although I was not a man who knew all about constitutional law; still I had an idea that a bill could be drafted that would be constitutional. I had not heard many of these gentlemen representing the railroads say that this bill is unconstitutional. On the contrary, they are satisfied with it and say nothing about its being unconstitutional. This makes me wonder why this sudden change on their part—have I convinced them or is this bill so favorable to them that they are willing to take it even if it is unconstitutional—which? I myself commence to doubt whether in its present form it is constitutional. I believe it would be a safer course to pursue to pass a bill which would be elective and cumulative, so that in case it should be declared unconstitutional that the thousands of injured employees or those dependent on those who are killed would have the present liability law as an alternative means of recovery.

That is the reason I believe it is a grave mistake to take away from them the law that now protects them, which formerly oppressed them, and merely make this bill a bill which provides for exclusive remedy and deprives them of the common law and statutory remedies.

Mr. BRANTLEY. You of course understand by that section to which you refer that the liability law is not repealed in terms, and that consequently if the compensation law should be held unconstitutional the liability law is still on the books.

Mr. SABATH. That may be true, but during that time look at the uncertainty and in what positions many of these unfortunate people may be placed.

Mr. MCCOY. Your point would be, as I understand it, that if this was made an elective law, some one test case could be picked out and carried to the Supreme Court. In the meanwhile the injured could proceed under their present rights, under the rights as they are now?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. Why would not that happen anyway?

Mr. SABATH. Because this takes away from them the right to proceed under the old law.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly, but it would be like this case Mr. MCCOY has drawn. If that was held unconstitutional the other law would be in force.

Mr. SABATH. But in the meanwhile people are being killed and injured every day.

Mr. NORRIS. So it would be in the other case. People would still be being killed and injured every day.

Mr. SABATH. But why should we repeal something which is certain, for something which is uncertain?

Mr. NORRIS. It is not.

Mr. SABATH. We do not know how this act will operate, but we know what we have now, and that is the reason I believe we should make this elective.

Mr. MCCOY. Your point, as I understand it, is right here: While a case under this act was being tested up through the Supreme Court people would not know whether they had better proceed under this act or whether they had better proceed under the present practice. And in the meanwhile not wishing to sacrifice what they considered their greater rights under the law as at present, and not wanting to go in under this law, the statutory limitations might run.

Mr. SABATH. That is correct, in part. What I desire to state or the point I wish to make is this: This bill provides for exclusive remedy in cases of personal injuries between master and servant or employer and employee.

It provides that how and what such employee can recover, or to what he is entitled for his injuries, or his dependents for his death. Such employee or his dependents to be estopped to proceed under the present law, but would take and receive compensation under this law, and if, after two or three years, the Supreme Court should hold this act unconstitutional, the statutory limitations having run, it may be possible for untold thousands of such injured employees to be deprived of any and all rights for the reason that this law, being declared unconstitutional, under the present law they would be barred from recovery on account of the statutory limitations.

Mr. BRANTLEY. It is a two-year limitation, though. And during that two years if any serious question was raised about the constitutionality of this law, it would be a very simple matter to protect any existing rights that would be necessary in the two years. But does this bill protect the existing or pending rights? I admit that it would be a simple matter, so why not do it?

Mr. MCCOY. I was just trying to get at the point he makes.

Mr. SABATH. I take it that we desire to pass a law that will aid and assist those unfortunates who are crippled each and every day on our railroads, and that it is not the desire of anyone to take anything from them. If that is the aim, why not make this elective and leave them what they have, and find out whether this can take its place and whether it will be a good law? We do desire, and I feel confident that the majority of the members of the committee desire, to make it simpler, make it easier, and make it better, and to equitably and justly compensate such injured employees, and until we are sure that this bill will do what is claimed for it, or rather what others claim for it, I maintain we should not repeal any existing law.

This bill is restricted to employees who are injured on the railroad. My bill included all those who were injured while employed in interstate commerce, which includes the employees of the express companies, Pullman Co., telephone, telegraph, and, in fact, all employees over which Congress has jurisdiction, including employees on mail roads, under interstate commerce, and Government employees.

Mr. BRANTLEY. I might say in that connection—I don't know whether it was stated in your presence—I think I can speak for the commission that they are in favor of extending this law to all people engaged in interstate commerce. But inasmuch as this question is a new one under the limitation of the Federal Constitution, we thought it was better to confine ourselves to that class where the power of Congress has been made sufficiently clear by the Supreme Court. And if the principle is sustained, I do not think there will be any doubt about the law being extended to all these other classes.

Mr. SABATH. I shall now, with your kind indulgence, take up section 3. This is a dangerous section and I desire to call your attention to it. It provides:

"That except as provided herein no such employer shall be civilly liable for any personal injury to or death of any such employee resulting from any such accident."

I am not sure that we are covering all such employees in this bill, and if this bill does not cover all those who are injured or killed they will be excluded from recovering under this bill, and employers will not be liable as already shown, in any case not covered by this bill.

Mr. BRANTLEY. We thought the word "such" qualified it. It was put in there in order to do that.

Mr. SABATH. I do not know, Judge. I think it is a dangerous provision and may eliminate a great many thousands of people who are injured from recovering at all in any way, shape, or manner.

Mr. BRANTLEY. I may state in that connection that when we came to finally draft that particular section we called in a law writer, Mr. Beeman, of great experience in drafting particular phraseology, and that particular language was worked out after a long conference with him. We think—of course we may be mistaken—that it is sufficiently guarded.

Mr. SABATH. Why should that section be in there?

Mr. BRANTLEY. We say who should recover here, and we say that no one else can recover.

Mr. SABATH. Of course I understand that you state who shall and that no one else can recover; that is what I object to. Are you sure that the bill is covering all? I am inclined to believe that you do not cover all; yes—I am positive you don't, and then you say those who are not covered can not recover civilly.

Mr. BRANTLEY. "Such employer," "such employee," and "such accident" undoubtedly refers to the employer and employee that this bill covers.

Mr. SABATH. Well, I am not sure; I hope you will think that over, because such employees as are not included will be deprived of any and all rights and remedies, as the section clearly shows that no such employer shall be civilly liable except as provided under this bill.

As to the next section, section 4, I am not going to waste much time on that, because it is a section which provides that no employee shall receive compensation in the case of injury that does not last over 14 days. That has been covered by Senator REED, and also by Senator SMITH. I desire to call your attention to the fact that notwithstanding that the former English act provided for 14 days, after years of actual experience they have amended the law and have now provided for only 7 days. I believe 7 days in place of 14 should be substituted.

Mr. NORRIS. You think, then, do you, that there should be some limit in there?

Mr. SABATH. I myself always thought that there should be some limitation.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that was a provision that struck me at the time as being a little peculiar, and I have listened carefully to what has been said.

Mr. SABATH. But it should not be any longer period than seven days.

Section 5 provides that after the expiration of the 14 days mentioned in the foregoing section the employer shall continue to furnish such medical and surgical aid and assistance as may be reasonably required, including hospital services. There is nothing here that would give such injured employees the right to secure their own physician. Knowing what I do about certain railroad physicians, I doubt very much whether this provision is beneficial to such injured employees, and I am of the opinion that this section should be amended so that such injured employees would have the right and privilege to engage and secure their own family physician or some other doctor in whom they have confidence.

Section 6 provides that no compensation shall be allowed for the injury or death of any employee where it is proved that his injury or death was occasioned by his willful intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or another, or that the same resulted from his intoxication while on duty. Gentlemen, it is claimed for the workman-compensation bill that it will eliminate lawsuits. I was under the impression when I started to look into the question of workman-compensation laws that such law would eliminate lawsuits. I am still of the opinion that it will if we will not inject into it provisions that mean nothing else but lawsuits.

True, perhaps, in the State from which Senator SMITH comes people do not drink much, and they may not drink because they can not get it; but in the State where I live and in other States the railroad employees do drink. I do not say they drink to excess, but they do take a drink once in awhile. And from what I know of railroad claim agents and railroad lawyers I am confident that whenever they will be able to show that a man has taken a drink, whether even the day or week before, they are going to try to show that at the time he received the injury he was under the influence of liquor, or, in other words, will claim that the injury resulted from intoxication, and for that reason he is not entitled to recover. The result, litigation, a lawsuit, and chance and opportunity to the railroads to defeat large numbers of claims of such injured employees. This is a dangerous provision and should be eliminated. I am of the opinion that the railroads are in a position to engage men in whom they have confidence, who will not violate their rules, and who do not drink to excess. In fact, it is their duty to do so. They owe it to the public to eliminate drunkards from handling and operating trains.

Mr. NORRIS. Would you eliminate the whole provision, or just that part?

Mr. SABATH. No; just that part. The other is all right.

Mr. NORRIS. The other, as a matter of fact, would bring the same litigation, would it not, if you left it in? You are not escaping entirely from litigation?

Mr. SABATH. No; it must be willful intention.

Mr. NORRIS. But the question would arise whether he did it purposely or not.

Mr. SABATH. That would be very hard to prove, because there is not a man in a thousand—yes, not a man in ten thousand—who would willfully injure himself.

Mr. NORRIS. I am of the opinion that it ought to stay in—that part of it—but I am just calling your attention to the fact that we can not get away from some litigation. I think that must be conceded.

Mr. SABATH. I think there will be very little litigation under this section if it is amended as suggested by me, because it will be left to the railroad to prove that the injury was brought about willfully. I am in favor of that provision and think it is sound, with the exception of the clause about intoxication.

Mr. FLOYD. There would be practically no cases where a man would willfully injure himself.

Mr. SABATH. Not one in ten thousand.

Mr. BRANTLEY. It is a great improvement over the English law, which says if a man is guilty of serious willful misconduct, he can not recover. It is a great step beyond that.

Mr. SABATH. I did not follow the English law. I don't know whether you ever took the time to read my bill. My provision reads as follows:

"That no compensation shall be allowed where it is proved that his injury or death was occasioned by his willful, wanton, and premeditated intention to bring about injury or death of himself or another."

Mr. FLOYD. I would like to ask Judge BRANTLEY a question in regard to that one provision. The theory upon which you advocate paying the man who has caused the accident through his own gross neglect, without fault on the part of the railroad company, is that when he is killed he has left dependent a family, and it is to relieve the suffering of the family. What reason is there for not applying the principle to the man that may be drunk and is killed? His family will become a burden on the community.

Mr. BRANTLEY. The only thought the commission had with reference to that was to take care of the public. We thought we ought to penalize the railroad man who is inherently responsible for human life, and that if he deliberately gets drunk and runs a train and gets hurt he ought not to be compensated.

Mr. SABATH. Railroads should not employ drunkards. I will say this, however, frequently you have switchmen and brakemen working in the open where it is below zero. They have no chance to get a warm meal, but they have a chance and time to take a glass of whisky, believing that it will warm them up and stimulate them.

Mr. BRANTLEY. That does not exclude him from compensation. The language of the bill is that his injury must result from it. That is much better.

Mr. SABATH. "That the same resulted from his intoxication while on duty." He may be on duty, and he may take a drink. He might have taken a drink before he went on duty. And if the claim agent of the railroad comes there within a half hour or an hour after the accident has occurred, and he detects from the man's breath, if he is alive, that he had taken a drink, a little beer or some whisky, it will be set up as a defense, and it will be claimed that he was intoxicated at the time the accident occurred.

Mr. BRANTLEY. If you were the court, would you hold those facts as a defense?

Mr. SABATH. I would not; but what would these Federal judge-appointed adjusters hold?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Why do you assume anybody else would?

Mr. SABATH. Because I know the railroad claim agents and what they will do. They will stop at nothing and, as a rule, prove anything and everything needed to defeat a claim.

Mr. BRANTLEY. The claim agent can not adjust this matter.

Mr. SABATH. He will testify and arrange the defense so as to show that the injured employee was guilty of intoxication, and the burden will be on the employee to disprove.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Suppose he does. Suppose he does prove that the man takes a drink.

Mr. SABATH. It means a contention, it means litigation, it means a contest. The main thing in a compensation law is to eliminate litigation. This provision is an invitation to litigation, and it means really the defeat of many cases.

Mr. BRANTLEY. If the railroad litigates upon that point and fails to sustain its contention, it is penalized.

Mr. SABATH. That is an excellent provision inserted in that bill. I approve of that penalty, of that clause penalizing the railroads in case they do appeal and the judgment is not reduced, or the amount is found to be the same as recommended, they should be penalized; because if that were not so, they would be appealing every case. They have been doing it before, and they are not getting any better. But under this provision it would not be the railroad that would appeal. I am afraid that in the majority of cases the employee would be obliged to appeal.

I also notice that the bill gives only 30 days' time in which to give notice, and if the employee does not notify the railroad within 30 days, in some cases 90 days, he is precluded from recovery.

Mr. BRANTLEY. He is given 90 days.

Mr. SABATH. That should be at least in the first place 90 days, and in the second provision a year. Senator REED has called your attention to it, and I will hurry on.

Section 8 provides:

"In case of death it shall be lawful for the employer and any of the dependents of the deceased employee to settle by agreement in like manner and with the same effect the compensation payable to such dependents under this act."

That being the case, I am afraid that in a great many cases the railroad will force a settlement of these matters in a way that will not be favorable to the employee. That provision should be safeguarded, and there should be a provision that would provide that such settlement should be approved by a probate judge or the judge of a district or circuit court and not until he has satisfied himself that it is for the best interest of such dependents.

This section, unless amended as I have suggested, would give them the right to force any kind of settlement. From what I know about these settlements I am satisfied that frequently and in a great many cases such injured employee would be scared by the claim agent of the railroad into a settlement which would be unfavorable, unfair, and unjust. The employees and those whom they leave behind them in case of death should be protected.

Mr. NORRIS. Would you take away from him the right to settle?

Mr. SABATH. No; but such settlement should first be approved by a judge of the probate, district, or circuit courts.

Mr. BRANTLEY. You know there are some safeguards, because in the first place any settlement that does not comply with the law, that gives a man less than this law entitles him to, is void; and then, secondly, if he makes a settlement thinking his injury only temporary, he can have it reopened and reheard and collect what he ought to have.

Mr. SABATH. That is in some cases only.

Mr. BRANTLEY. In all.

Mr. SABATH. But I think under this provision they would have a right to make any kind of a settlement that they desired. And a settlement will dispose of the matter and can not be reopened. Cases that can be reopened are those where the employee is receiving compensation and either party may within two years make application for increase or decrease of such compensation, as the case may be.

Mr. BRANTLEY. He can not do it in this bill.

Mr. SABATH. I am again obliged to differ with you, Judge.

Mr. FLOYD. Provided they do not agree to pay him more than the bill calls for, and if so, the contract would be void, the same as if it were less.

Mr. SABATH. Section 10 should be amended. It provides:

"That before any agreement or award has been made or after the making of any such agreement or award, and at any time before the expiration of two years from the date of the accident, it shall be the duty of the injured employee, if so requested by the employer, to submit himself one or more times, at reasonable times and places for examination," etc.

There may be, however, cases where it would be impossible for such injured employee to present himself or to go to a certain place for examination. There should be an amendment there saying, "if physically able." In its present form, if a demand was made upon him to present himself at a certain place and he was not able to do so, notwithstanding his physical inability he would be precluded from further remedy or compensation.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree that that ought to be perfectly safe, but would not the word "reasonable" which is there make it so? That is included in the language and would seem to cover all the ground that is necessary to cover.

Mr. SABATH. "Reasonable times." The words "reasonable times" mean that they should not demand him to present himself every week or every two weeks for reexamination. But if they should make a demand upon him in 60 days, and he would be unable to go to the place that they might designate, they could say that he had failed to make his appearance, and he would be precluded from recovery.

Mr. NORRIS. He ought not to be required to go any place. They ought to come to him if they want that examination.

Mr. SABATH. I am only pointing out some of the defects, because the gentleman of the committee, Mr. HIGGINS, insisted that I should point out some of the defects, if there were any, in the bill; and also because some one stated yesterday that gentlemen came here condemning the bill without aiding or assisting or enlightening the committee wherein it was defective.

Mr. BRANTLEY. The first examination referred to in section 10 is before there has been any agreement. Section 11 is after the agreement has been entered into.

Mr. SABATH. Look at line 19 in section 10.

"If the employee refuses to submit himself to any such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to payment or compensation and his right to take or prosecute any proceeding under this act shall be suspended until he shall have submitted himself for such examination."

Mr. BRANTLEY. That is before there has been any settlement made with him whatever.

Mr. SABATH. But in the meanwhile he will be deprived of any such compensation, he will be deprived of any aid or assistance.

Mr. BRANTLEY. That is the provision that is in every compensation law I ever read, that the man after he is hurt can not come and say, "I am entitled to $50 a month," and refuse to say how he is hurt or submit himself to any examination.

Mr. SABATH. He will be at home, and anyone could examine him. I only say in case he would be physically unable to present himself. I admit that a railroad should have the right to examine the man and see whether he has been injured and whether he is really disabled. But I do not desire to place a man at a disadvantage, place him in a position where, if he is unable to make his appearance or go 5 or 10 or 20 or 50 miles to be examined, his compensation would be stopped.

Mr. BRANTLEY. The words "submit to examination" do not involve the idea of traveling and going to any particular place. The man can say any day, right on the flat of his back, "I am ready to submit to an examination," and he has complied with the law.

Mr. SABATH. I do not know. It is a question, and we should not leave any of these things where any question can arise.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with that, but I submit this question to you. It says, "If so requested by the employer, to submit himself one or more times, at reasonable times and places." If a man were sick, injured so that he was not able to go out, and the railroad company asked him to come to some other town and submit to an examination, would anybody say that was a reasonable time or place?

Mr. SABATH. I do not know.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me it would be plain that that would be an unreasonable proposition.

Mr. SABATH. It would; but frequently the attorneys for defendants in a damage suit will bring forward unreasonable propositions, and still we find some judges that rule with them.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am sorry to say that is sometimes true; but we can not eliminate that in any law we pass.

Mr. SABATH. But we should try and eliminate all provisions which are liable to create any doubt.

You have the Senate bill. I do not know whether it still retains this provision, although I was given to understand that it has been eliminated, namely, in section 10, page 11, line 5, this bill provides that—

"The United States court, upon application of the employer, may in any case of death, for good cause, order an autopsy at the expense of the employer."

Well, that has been changed so that it is now under the order of the court. The Senate must have amended it, but even as amended it is objectionable, as it will again give the railroads opportunity, through their skilled experts, to contest after a man has been killed and buried for months to prove that his death was brought about or due to some other cause.

Section 13 is objectionable because, I believe, it will be unfair to ask the laboring people of this country to be bound by an adjuster who is appointed by the Federal judge. I have been under the impression that the Interstate Commerce Commission is in a better position to enforce this act than any other body. We know that that body has been fair; that they are acquainted with the railroad conditions, with the employers and employees. It seems to me the people of this country have more confidence in that body than they have in our judges, who are appointed for life. I believe it would be simpler and better to give the execution of this law to the Interstate Commerce Commission and give them the right to appoint examiners or adjusters. I believe that they would appoint men who have more experience and who would be fairer than the men the judges of the courts would appoint.

Mr. NORRIS. How would that be in a geographical sense? You would have one for each judicial district?

Mr. SABATH. One for each judicial district where he is needed or where his services are required. Of course, it is true that some judicial districts would have to have two or three. They would know better than anyone else.

It would be less expensive, and I think they would have men who are more familiar with the conditions than any man a judge of the Federal court would appoint. I am very much opposed to giving the Federal judges the right to appoint these adjusters, because if they would do as their masters, if they would be men with the same views and the same ideas as the judges who appoint them, I regret to say we could not expect a great deal from them. Lawyers representing injured employees at all times dread to go before the Federal courts in these cases; now you propose to turn all of these cases over to their appointees.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me make this suggestion: Instead of limiting it by judicial districts, would it not be better to do it by States, and then upon the recommendation of the Attorney General appoint additional adjusters where the States require it?

Mr. SABATH. I would not even leave it to the Attorney General. In one of the first bills I introduced I provided that a commission be created consisting of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Commissioner of Labor, and be given jurisdiction in enforcing this act. I am of the opinion that such a commission would be a great deal better to administer this law than is provided for in this bill.

Sections 12 and 13 have been covered by Senator SMITH. There are some objections in them, but time will not permit me to take up these two sections.

On page 23, paragraph 3 of section 14, notwithstanding that the commission meant well, I think there is a dangerous provision. It provides:

"The adjuster shall allow either party to be represented by counsel, or an agent, who need not be a member of the bar."

In large centers we have a great many runners, or men who are often even below what we term ambulance chasers—shysters—a man who is not a lawyer, but who is in the employ of a lawyer, ex-constable or a claim collector, who cares not whom he serves, and who for a few dollars will do anything and everything.

I am under the impression if this would be permitted that in a great many cases these men would go out and represent or misrepresent such injured employee or such dependents, without having any ability, honesty, or conscience. Instead of looking after the employee's interest, they would be looking after the interest of the railroad by aiding their claim agent. I think that this provision should be amended and safeguarded.

Mr. NORRIS. How would you amend that?

Mr. SABATH. I would amend it in such manner as to eliminate all sharks or professional claim agents or go-betweens from being permitted to handle any of these cases, or unless he is a lawyer; or one who would receive no compensation for it from the employer or the employee, and aid in settlement as a friend. I have made a little memorandum, in a hurry, a clause which might be inserted, to read as follows:

"It should be unlawful for anyone to represent the employee in any case under this act receiving compensation from or being on the employers' pay roll. Any violation of which be punishable by a fine of not to exceed $1,000, or by imprisonment of not more than six months, or both."

Mr. NORRIS. That is to prevent the employee being taken advantage of?

Mr. SABATH. That is to prevent unscrupulous men and rascals from preying upon the unfortunate widow and orphans of people injured and killed.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, pretending to represent them when they are in the employment of the railroad company?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is a very good suggestion. It certainly can not hurt anything.

Mr. SABATH. Indeed it can not, and we in the large centers know how much of such abuse exists.

Mr. NORRIS. Where do you suggest that amendment would come in?

Mr. SABATH. On page 23, in section 3, line 10, after the word "bar."

Another reason why this should be corrected is this: We are giving the right of appeal in these matters. How will such men, who do not know anything about the law, perfect his record or bring out such evidence that would protect such injured employee?

Mr. NORRIS. You would confine it to attorneys?

Mr. SABATH. I think it would be safer. I know it will be very hard for the people under this act to secure the services of any really good attorney because there is so little that they can receive under this bill that it will be very hard for them to secure the services of a good lawyer.

Mr. WEBB. Do you think the court ought to have the right to say what compensation counsel should have?

Mr. SABATH. I believe the bill should be amended also in that respect. In a great many States the attorney for the plaintiff is allowed by the court a certain compensation for his services. I think that in these cases where the employer forces the employee to appeal, or where through other unfair means will force him to appeal, provision should be made for compensation for the services of employee's attorney because otherwise it will be absolutely impossible for such injured employee to secure the services of a decent lawyer.

Section 14, paragraph 4, provides, as to services in the case of notice of a trial and filing exceptions, only 5 days is given. It is absolutely unreasonable, and it should be made at least 30 days.

Also in that respect where trial by jury is demanded by the railroad filing exceptions, and after the service of exceptions, then the other party shall have the right for an additional five days to demand a jury. You see only five days are allowed.

I believe in protecting the injured employee, his widow, and his orphans to the best of our ability. Inasmuch as we are legislating, and it is our desire to enact legislation which is fair and just, let us pass an act, even if it should take a few days longer to perfect it, of which we all can be proud, and where we can truthfully say that we have done our work fairly, honestly, and that we have done it well.

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I am concerned, I welcome any man's criticism of the bill, because that is what I want to hear. I think we have heard a great deal of argument on the general proposition as to whether we ought to have compensation or not. As far as I am concerned, I do not care to hear any more on that, but I am interested in any suggestions of amendments or changes. If we pass a bill at all, I would like to have as good a one as possible.

Mr. SABATH. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. NORRIS. As long as a man confines himself to the bill and does not devote too much to glittering generalities, I feel I am not wasting my time.

Mr. SABATH. No one has ever charged me with indulging in glittering generalities.

Mr. Chairman, I will now take up the compensation features of this bill. The most liberal provision in this bill is in the case of death, and in that provision this bill provides for a compensation of 50 per cent of such deceased employee's monthly wages for eight years, said wages not to exceed $100 a month. So, notwithstanding that this is the most liberal provision in the entire schedule, the most that can be recovered in case of death will be $4,800, and that only in a very few instances.

Mr. NORRIS. In case of total disability, it seems to me, that compensation is much more liberal. There it runs for life.

Mr. SABATH. I know; but in certain permanent-disability cases, if we will study all the provisions carefully we will find that it is not as liberal as some people try to make us believe, the bill again being so safeguarded that there will only be a few such cases that will be entitled to compensation for life.

Mr. BRANTLEY. You do not mean that $4,800 is the maximum amount for death to be recovered?

Mr. SABATH. That is the maximum, is it not? That is the way I read the bill.

Mr. BRANTLEY. No; the bill has been amended in the Senate and agreed to by Senator SUTHERLAND for the commission to continue those payments where there were minor children until they are 16 years of age, and if the child be a girl until 20, unless she is married before that time. So that if a man is killed, leaving a widow and two or three small children, his family might be paid anywhere from eight or ten to eleven thousand dollars.

Mr. SABATH. I am pleased that the Senate amended it and extended the payments, but I hardly believe that it would ever reach that amount, because the compensation would only run to that dependent's child, and inasmuch as in another section of the bill you provide that such dependent child shall be allowed only a certain percentage, namely, only 25 per cent, or, at most, $25 per month.

Mr. BRANTLEY. It must run for eight years. If he leaves an infant and a 2-year-old, a 4-year-old, and a 6-year-old child, they get their compensation until they reach the age of 16 and until the girls reach the age of 20, and it would go far beyond $4,800. The $4,800 must be paid anyhow.

Mr. SABATH. You are mistaken, sir.

Mr. FLOYD. Suppose he left only one child, and she was 19 years old when he was killed, and there was no mother. How long would the daughter's compensation last?

Mr. BRANTLEY. One year.

Mr. FLOYD. She would be absolutely cut off after that year?

Mr. BRANTLEY. If she was the only survivor.

Mr. FLOYD. Compensation is to be received by the parents. That is the theory, then, of compensation.

Mr. NORRIS. In that case the amount would not be paid as you specified awhile ago.

Mr. BRANTLEY. I am speaking of possibilities.

Mr. FLOYD. In any case he said $4,800 is paid. I cited the case of a girl, where there was no widow, and the daughter is 19 years old. I asked him if the compensation would not cease at the end of one year.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose she was 20; would there be any compensation?

Mr. FLOYD. No.

Mr. WEBB. Where you get the eight-year period you do not contend that the railroad would actually pay $4,800. I have understood that, considering the interest on the money which would be reserved to the railroads during these periods, the railroad would actually pay out but $3,800, but it would have the use of the money until it was all paid over.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is a fair way of doing it; that is the way they do it in all courts of justice.

Mr. NORRIS. That is fair; but at the same time it seems to me that the payment of this sum in installments is vastly superior to paying it in a lump sum. I have seen so often where the widow got a large sum of money in insurance or otherwise, and it was dissipated or lost.

Mr. BRANTLEY. I do not think there were any representatives of labor who appeared before the commission that were not in favor of having this money paid over periodically.

Mr. SABATH. I have always advocated these annuities or installment payments, with the exception that where there is an extraordinary case which would permit a lump sum, and then only with the approval of a probate judge or such court having jurisdiction over minors. Conditions may arise where such a sum, if given to the dependent, it would do them more good than in case they received it in monthly installments. But such sum should not be given, except as I have stated. The probate judge of such county having jurisdiction would sanction such settlement as he believed, in his judgment, to be for the best interests of the dependents.

Mr. NORRIS. While it may not be exactly germane to this proposition, yet it is interesting and bears somewhat upon it. Several years ago, about 15, I had called to my attention a particular case of a man who had died leaving some life insurance. He left a widow. It was supposed that he was in very good circumstances. He was, as a matter of fact. His partners, however, after his death, with the consent of the widow, invested the property. They supposed it was going to be very profitable, but they lost it all, including his life insurance.

He was a prominent man in the town where he lived. The insurance was paid very promptly. As a matter of fact, the widow never saw the agent. The agent came to town within three or four days after the funeral and saw his partners. The dead man's partners wrote out a receipt for the widow to sign. It was taken up and the widow signed it, and the money was paid to the partners. They invested the money for the widow. It was all done honestly. There was nobody who was trying to get any financial profit out of it, and nobody did. But they lost every dollar, and that widow within two years from that time was milking a cow in a little home that her husband had left there, selling milk to her neighbors, baking bread, and supplying neighbors who were able to buy.

Mr. WEBB. That is an exceptional case.

Mr. NORRIS. I know it is. But that started me to thinking, and I have studied it off and on, watching things of that kind where insurance has been paid. I took it up with some insurance men. I had several life-insurance policies myself. But from that time I never took out one policy where the insurance was to be paid in a lump sum. I have taken out policies making it impossible for the beneficiary to do what this bill lets the beneficiary do, that they can not settle under the policy and have it paid in a lump sum. If the widow loses the first payment, she has not lost very much. She has suffered an experience and she will try again, and next time she will be more careful and will learn how to take care of her money. If she gets it all at once, it takes her some time before she develops the ability to take care of it, and in that time she may lose most or all of it.

I think that it is the better plan, and I should hesitate here to allow the railroads to pay a lump sum, even under certain provisions.

Mr. SABATH. Not without the consent of the courts, as it would often be an easy matter for the heartless railroad agent to persuade them to take much less than even they would be entitled to under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. I understood Judge NORRIS's idea is even with the approval of the court it is questionable.

Mr. SABATH. There may be some cases where is might be beneficial.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume there are.

Mr. SABATH. Where a lump sum may be of greater benefit.

Mr. NORRIS. But you know you have had experience in the courts. We all know orders of this kind are rather perfunctory. The advice comes from relatives and friends. They say "Yes, this is a good order to make," and the order is fixed. Ordinarily a probate judge who is acquainted with the people will say, "Let this widow have money," and they do not give it the consideration that ought to be given.

Mr. SABATH. I even safeguard that. I say with the approval of the probate court and the commission.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course the commission here in Washington could not give attention to things like that.

Mr. SABATH. They would have a deputy or agent in the district.

Mr. NORRIS. But he would have to take somebody else's word for it always.

Mr. SABATH. Still I believe it could be done with the utmost care and provide very careful investigation of conditions of such people.

Mr. BRANTLEY. We had it urged upon us, and we thought we did not want any provision made whatever for a commutation. We finally put in this language in section 29 that it could be commuted by court, the application for that purpose—"to be considered by the court sitting without a jury and can be granted where it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the payment of a lump sum in lieu of future monthly payments will be for the best interests of the person or persons receiving or dependent upon such compensation, or that the continuance of monthly payments will, as compared with lump-sum payments, entail undue expense or undue hardship upon the employer liable therefor, or that the person entitled to compensation has removed or is about to remove from the United States."

Mr. NORRIS. My objection to it is that this kind of an order made in the courts is merely a matter of form. I know from my own experience. In my State the county court and probate judge has no authority from the legislature to safeguard the rights of minors. It took away from them the right of property as well as of real estate, and you have to go up in the higher court, into the district court, to get that kind of an order. I have signed lots and lots of them myself when I was on the bench. I know as a rule I got very little information, and from my experience as an attorney when I was getting those kind of orders, it was easy to get them. It was mostly a matter of form. And lots of times money was lost in that way.

Mr. WEBB. Even though the lump sum be paid in a case where the deferred payments would amount to forty-eight hundred, the railroads would not agree to pay more than the present value, which is $3,800 in cash. It would settle the amount represented by $3,800.

Mr. NORRIS. If you do allow commutation, it seems proper that the actual payment should be less than would finally be paid if the payments were made in installments, deferred payments.

Mr. WEBB. It would be proper if your compensation law is fair and just.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course it is outside of that.

Mr. SABATH. In all of these cases the compensation is not nearly as high as it should be.

Mr. WEBB. You mean in this bill?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask you a question on that, the same question I asked of Senator SUTHERLAND, I think. Objection was made by Senator SMITH that this bill did not pay high enough compensation to men who were getting a large salary and had a large income; that it cut them down in order to pay something to the man who under the ordinary provisions of the law could not get anything. The idea is that the man who is not negligent does not get any more—or, if he is killed, his family do not get any more—than the man who is negligent. Would it be possible to put a provision in the law that would differentiate between the man who was negligent and the man who was not or between the widow of these two classes?

Mr. SABATH. That would be a dangerous provision. It would mean litigation, and furthermore the widow of a man that was negligent, as well as the widow and the children of a man who was not, would need to be supported and should be provided for.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. SABATH. This workmen compensation bill is drafted to take care of all those unfortunate people that, through no fault of theirs, are deprived of their support.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand. But to-day Senator SMITH made quite an argument, and there was a good deal of force in it, that by this law we propose here we give as much to the man who was negligent and careless as we do to the man who was careful and who was in no way to blame.

Mr. SABATH. I agree that the careless man will receive the same compensation as the one who is careful. But we know that in a great majority of cases where we charge negligence it is not. The railroad employees, as well as others working on or with machines, have no choice. It is speed, which they are obliged to maintain, and the dangerous and hazardous work they are obliged to perform that is responsible.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The speed, the machinery, the electricity, the steam that forces these men on is such that onlookers believe they are negligent. But they are not, for after they have been at the engine throttle or at coupling cars for some time they become used to the work, speed, and the danger, and do things without ever realizing how dangerous it is. But no fault is found or objection raised until such employee is injured, then it is brought forward as a defense. In fact, they are driven on by the conditions under which they work and the nature of their employment. In 95 per cent of these cases it is not negligence at all. It is due to the conditions—to the dangerous and hazardous occupation they are engaged in. It is the speed at which they are forced to go. It is an inherent risk.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to give you an actual occurrence. My neighbor at that time, and a very fine neighbor with a fine family, was a conductor on a railroad that ran into my town. Our homes were within 30 feet of each other, with no fence between. He was conductor on one of the passenger trains. A "head-on" collision happened near my town, where, I think, 17 people were killed and a large number injured. The wreck was caused, as I understood from the railroad officials with whom I have talked, on account of the neglect of this neighbor of mine to get the necessary orders before he started out with his train. The result was a head-on collision with another train and without the fault of any of the officials of the other train.

Mr. SABATH. Was he not perhaps obliged to make up time?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. SABATH. Was he not behind time?

Mr. NORRIS. In this case he was not. While he did not do it intentionally, it was an oversight. There was a certain meeting point for this other train, which was late that day. He had the orders for it that he did not observe or something of that kind; some technicality of that kind. If he had examined his orders carefully and followed them he would have avoided the wreck.

Mr. SABATH. Did he have time enough to examine the orders carefully?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think he did. But the point I am making now is that the men on the other train who lost their lives were absolutely blameless. This man, who was to blame, as I understand, did not happen to be killed. But suppose he had been hurt and the other conductor on the other train, who was also a neighbor of mine, had been hurt; we would have paid them the same amount, and yet the carelessness of one of those men was to blame for the injury of the other one.

Now, I agree and I am in favor—I think I am in favor of this bill, although I want to amend it in some respects. But it seems to me if it were possible to differentiate we ought to do it. I do not know that it is. I ask you the question purely for information, and I asked it the same way of Senator SUTHERLAND.

Mr. WEBB. I remember a case similar to that outside of Washington a few years ago. There was a short train coming into Washington, and a heavy train was following it. Right out here at Takoma the red lights were set; the block was on the engineer. He had a very long train, 8 or 10 cars; very heavy. He came thundering along there at night, you might say recklessly and carelessly running, because he did not observe the red lights set there, which the rules and regulations required him to do. He went flashing by and crashed into the other and shorter train, killing and wounding a number of passengers, and was killed himself. He was operating his train very recklessly.

Mr. HARDWICK. If that be true, this sort of a system puts a premium on carelessness.

Mr. WEBB. I have argued that all along.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe that. This neighbor of mine was as honest a man as ever lived. He was not a careless man, but I understand he was to blame for this wreck. Somebody is to blame as a rule for almost all of the wrecks, and at the same time while I want to compensate him I want to compensate his family in case of his death——

Mr. SABATH (interposing). That is the thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Still I would like to make a difference, if I could, without endangering the principle.

Mr. SABATH. I hardly believe it is possible; at least I have not been able to think of a scheme under which it would be possible. I go upon this broad theory that when a man is killed, whether he has been careful or careless, he is dead, and if he has a wife and children they must eat and live, and for that reason they should be provided and cared for by those who are responsible, namely, the industry that crushes out one life every two hours and maims one employee every six minutes.

Why should this enormous sacrifice be exacted from railroad employees and others who are engaged in hazardous employments? Does the efficient operation of the Nation's transportation system require that this great burden should remain where it now unjustly lies? Suppose we admit that the terrible sacrifice of lives and limbs is necessary to railroad operation. Suppose we resign ourselves to the belief that our transportation must continue to crush out the lives of its operatives without abatement. Even then, can we excuse ourselves for saddling upon those operatives the financial burden of providing for the needs of their widows and orphans, made such by the very exigencies of the industry itself? Is it not more to the point and more akin to justice that this burden should be assumed by the transportation industry and, through it, by society as a whole? Commerce and industry should shoulder the burden of compensation for personal injuries to workmen, or to their widows or dependents, and it is but plain sense to say that this burden shall be made a fixed charge added to the cost of commerce and industry, which can easily and readily bear it. The maimed and crippled workmen or their widows and orphans can least afford to do so.

In Germany, in England, and other countries where this law prevails not one-eighth part of the accidents occur. Naturally it has been said that because of a liberal provision and compensation is allowed that the people will be reckless and careless because they can recover whether they are careless or not. The contrary is true, because in Germany not one-eighth part of the accidents occur where there is a fair compensation law in force.

Mr. NORRIS. That brings me to another point which I think illustrates just what you are saying and bears me out in the statement that I do not believe it is a premium on carelessness. The difficulty with a good many of these wrecks and accidents is this: A railroad company will want to get trains over the road; they will have certain rules and regulations that under certain conditions the conductor or engineer must not go faster than so much. But a train is late. They want that train to get through on time or to make up some time, or something. It can not be done without a violation of these rules and regulations.

Mr. SABATH. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. If the conductor and engineer violating the rules get through they praise them; if there is a wreck or an accident and the rules have been violated, they back up under the rules and they say, "We will not pay anything, because you have violated one of our plain rules."

Mr. SABATH. That is again correct.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is true sometimes.

Mr. SABATH. And that occurs on nearly every trip where something goes wrong somewhere, and one man must aid and assist another, and if some accident does occur and a man is injured while performing some other work than that to which he was assigned he can not recover; he was not in the performance of his duty. That also is a provision in this bill, and in that respect this bill ought to be amended.

Mr. WEBB. I offered an amendment to the effect that employees should not recover if the injury were produced by his willful negligence.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I am endeavoring to get away from. The bill does not provide for willful negligence, but where the injury is brought about willfully by himself.

Mr. WEBB. That he willfully intended to bring about the injury?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. But that is quite different from willful negligence.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; the amendment you suggest of negligence will bring about a great deal of litigation which workman compensation law aims to eliminate.

Mr. WEBB. Yes, and you will have it under this bill; lots of it.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; but if the committee will carefully go over this bill, knowing the ability the members possess, I feel confident they can perfect this bill so that it really will eliminate litigation. But if it should be passed as it is it would invite litigation, it would provide for litigation, even more litigation than we have now. What the country demands is that law be passed that would take care of all who are injured, as well as the families of those who are killed, without years of delay and expensive and troublesome litigation and tremendous waste.

Mr. Chairman, I shall now call your attention to section 20. It provides the method of arriving on the monthly earnings of the employees, and then goes on to state, line 11, page 31:

"For the purpose of such calculation no employee's wages shall be considered to be more than $100 a month or less than $50 a month."

And then this exception, "that when in any case the monthly wages of the employee are less than $25 per month, payment for the first 24 months of disability shall not exceed the full amount of such monthly wages."

Here you will notice at a glance what solicitude, what care, is demonstrated that such unfortunate who may be earning $25 per month would not be overpaid and receive more than he would be capable of handling or using. And under the first part of this provision an employee can not be earning more than $100 per month. Of course, that provision is placed in this bill again for the interest of those who are left behind by such unfortunate employee, for fear that they may receive greater compensation than they would know how to expend and protecting them from becoming spendthrifts.

Mr. Chairman, it is rather late, and I am not going to detain you much longer; but I do desire to call your attention to section 21, paragraph A, which reads as follows:

"Where death results from any injury, except in the cases provided for in section 23, and except in the cases in which, in certain contingencies, a reduced period is hereinafter provided for, the following amounts shall be paid for a period of 8 years from the date of the death: Provided, however, That this limitation shall not apply to any child under the age of 16 years; but payments shall continue to such child until it shall have attained the age of 16 years."

You will notice that even the limited amount allowed him will stop after eight years, and what will then become of such widow, perhaps unable to work and provide for herself and children, or of his old father or mother who are totally dependent upon him, who have become too old and feeble to take their place in the workshop?

Section 21 continues:

"(1) If the deceased employee leaves a widow and no child under the age of 16, and no dependent child over the age of 16, there shall be paid to the widow 40 per cent of the monthly wage of the deceased.

"(2) If the deceased employee leaves a widow and any child under the age of 16 or any dependent child over the age of 16 there shall be paid to the widow for the benefit of herself and such child or children 50 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased.

"(3) If the deceased employee leaves any child under the age of 16 or dependent child over the age of 16 but no widow there shall be paid, if one such child, 25 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased to such child, and if more than one such child 10 per cent additional for each of such children, not to exceed a total of 50 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased, divided among such children share and share alike: Provided, That if the number of children entitled to payment be subsequently reduced to less than four, the amount of the payments shall be correspondingly diminished."

So if there be only three children she will be entitled to only 40 per cent of his earnings, which may be about $50. She will then receive but $20 per month for the support of herself and three little ones. Oh, what liberality on the part of the commission!

"(4) In the event of the death or remarriage of a widow receiving payments under subdivision (2) of this clause, the amount stated in subdivision (3) shall thereafter be paid to the child or children of the deceased employee therein specified for the unexpired part of the period of eight years from the date of the employee's death, but to continue in any event until the youngest child shall have attained the age of 16 years, subject to the provisions of subdivision (9) of this clause (A).

"(5) If the deceased employee leave no widow or children entitled to any payment hereunder, but leave a parent or parents, there shall be paid, in case of partial dependency, 15 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased to such parent or parents, and if both or either are wholly dependent upon the deceased there shall be paid in lieu of the 15 per cent, if only one parent, 25 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased, or, if both parents, 40 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased to such parents or parent.

"(6) If the deceased leave no widow or child or parent entitled to any payment hereunder, but leave any brother, sister, grandparent, or grandchild wholly dependent upon him for support, there shall be paid to such dependent relative, if but one, 20 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased, or, if more than one, 30 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased, divided among them share and share alike. If none of such relatives is wholly dependent and the deceased leave any such relative or relatives partially dependent upon him for support, there shall be paid to such dependent relative or relatives 10 per cent of the monthly wages of the deceased, divided among them share and share alike."

You will notice how the amounts are reduced when and wherever possible. If we had at our disposal the statistical figures showing all those who leave only a widow or children above the age of 16 or only a parent or a brother and those that leave no dependents, you could easily see how unreasonably low is the compensation provided for in this bill.

We now come to paragraph 7 of section 21, which is the most objectionable feature of this bill and which should be amended or eliminated. It provides:

"The foregoing subdivisions of this clause (A) shall apply only to dependents who at the time of the death of the deceased employee are actual residents of the United States or contiguous countries, except (a) if the nonresident dependent be a widow and there be no resident child or children entitled to compensation under this act, there shall be paid to her a lump sum equal to one year's wages of the deceased employee, as hereinbefore defined and limited, for the benefit of herself and nonresident children, if any; (b) if the nonresident dependent be a child or children under the age of 16 years and there be no widow, resident or nonresident, and no resident children entitled to compensation under this act, there shall be paid to such nonresident child or children a like lump sum, to be divided among them share and share alike, it being the intention of the foregoing to exclude from the benefits of this act any such nonresident widow, child, or children, if there be any resident child or children entitled to compensation under this act, and to exclude from the benefits of this act all other resident dependents if there be any nonresident widow, child, or children entitled to take under the provision of this subdivision."

Gentlemen, this is another dangerous provision. By it you encourage and invite the railroads to employ and give preference to foreign labor by eliminating them from recovering or receiving even this meager compensation and thereby it will be cheaper to kill a foreigner than an American citizen. Yes; it will be still cheaper to kill those poor unfortunates. Think it over carefully.

Is not this paragraph cleverly drawn to relieve the railroads from paying even the small amounts provided for?

Now we come to paragraph 8, and see how liberal the commission was. They go so far as to provide the liberal sum of $75 for burial expenses of an employee who, in the performance of dangerous work for his employer, risked and lost his life. Paragraph 8 reads as follows:

"(8) If the monthly payments for a death hereunder are at the rate of not more than $15 per month there shall be paid by the employer a contribution of $75 toward the burial expenses: Provided, however, That where no compensation for death of an employee caused as defined by sections 1 and 2 of this act is payable hereunder there shall be furnished by the employer a reasonable burial expense not exceeding $150.

"(9) If compensation is being paid under this act to any dependent, such compensation, unless otherwise provided for herein, shall cease upon the death or marriage of such dependent, and in case the dependent be a child, shall cease upon such child reaching the age of 16, unless dependent, and then when such child shall cease to be dependent."

Section 21 B provides:

"(B) Where permanent total disability results from any injury, there shall be paid to the injured employee 50 per cent of the monthly wages of such employee during the remainder of his life"—

This would be fair and reasonable if it were not for the limitations in section 20—

"In the following cases it shall, for the purposes of this section, be conclusively presumed that the injury resulted in permanent total disability, to wit: The total and irrevocable loss of sight in both eyes, the loss of both feet at or above the ankle, the loss of both hands at or above the wrist, the loss of one hand and one foot, an injury to the spine resulting in permanent and complete paralysis of the legs or arms, and an injury to the skull resulting in incurable imbecility or insanity."

But these enumerated injuries are not sustained frequently on the railroads.

"(C) Where temporary total disability results from any injury there shall be paid 50 per cent of the monthly wages of the injured employee during the continuance of such temporary total disability.

"(D) Where permanent partial disability results from any injury—

"(1) An amount equal to 50 per cent of his wages shall be paid to the injured employee for the periods stated against such injuries, respectively, as follows: In case of—

"The loss by separation of one arm at or above the elbow joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one arm, 72 months"—

I presume that after 72 months such arm will grow forth again and he will be able to provide for his family as before—

"The loss by separation of one hand at or above the wrist joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one hand at or above the wrist joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one hand, 57 months."

Here again they expect him to recover his hand, but allow a shorter allotment of time, only 57 months. And what will he do then?

"The loss by separation of one leg at or above the knee joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one leg, 66 months.

"The loss by separation of one foot at or above the ankle joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one foot, 48 months."

What will such an injured employee be able to do after 48 months? Continuing:

"The permanent and complete hearing in both ears, 72 months.

"The permanent and complete loss of hearing in one ear, 36 months.

"The permanent and complete loss of the sight of one eye, 30 months."

In these cases they will pay him about one-quarter of his former wage in one case for 36 months; in the other case, the loss of one eye, 30 months.

"The loss by separation of a thumb, 13 months; a first finger, 9 months; a second finger, 7 months; a third finger, 6 months; a fourth finger, 5 months."

Oh, what extravagance. But what follows is still better:

"The loss of one phalanx of a thumb or two phalanges of a finger shall be considered equal to the loss of one-half of a thumb or of a finger, and compensation for one-half of the above periods shall be payable.

"The loss of more than one phalanx of a thumb and more than two phalanges of a finger shall be considered as the loss of an entire thumb or finger."

Kindly study the liberality for the loss of a finger. They are so magnanimous that they allow the payment for one-half of five months of one-quarter of his wages, which may amount to $125 with the highest allowance.

"The loss by separation of a great toe, nine months; any other toe, four months."

In this case, again, they believe the toes will sprout forth again.

"(2) In all other cases of injury resulting in permanent partial disability the compensation shall bear such relation to the periods stated in the subdivision 1 of this clause (D) as the disabilities bear to those produced by the injuries named therein, and payments shall be made for proportionate periods not in any case exceeding 72 months."

Why do they always name a maximum limit and not a minimum limit?

"(E) Where temporary partial disability results from an injury, the employee, if he is unable to secure work, shall receive 50 per cent of his wages during the continuance of such disability; but such payment shall not extend beyond the period fixed for payment for permanent partial disabilities of the same character; and if the employee refuses to work after suitable work is furnished or secured for him by the employer, he shall not be entitled to any compensation for such disability during the continuance of such refusal."

Why not state that if the employee is capable to perform such work?

"If the employee is at work at reduced wages, he shall receive compensation according to the method provided in section 22.

"SEC. 22. That, notwithstanding any agreement, award, finding, or judgment, as hereinbefore provided for, the employer may continue such injured employee in his service at suitable work, and if the employee accept such work and continue in his employer's service, compensation in any case of injury shall be suspended while the injured employee is at such work for which he receives wages he was receiving at the time of the accident. If his wages received fall below such 90 per cent, an amount of compensation shall be payable equal to the difference between said 90 per cent and such wages, not to exceed, however, 50 per cent of the monthly wages he was receiving at the time of the accident.

"The time during which the employee is at such work shall effect a reduction to that extent in the aggregate period for which payments would otherwise be paid."

Why that provision? Unless it be to provide such injured employees with work during the time the employer would be liable, and as soon as the liability ceased the employee would be discharged. It has been done before and is being done now in many cases where they are employed for a year or two, and as soon as the statutory time wherein he can file suit has expired, he is let out, his services not being needed any longer.

"SEC. 23. That should an employee who sustains an injury resulting in permanent total or permanent partial disability die from any cause at any time, or should an employee who sustains an injury resulting in temporary or total or temporary partial disability die as a result of such injury after 14 days of disability, the employer shall be liable for an amount to be ascertained as follows:

"First. By computing the amount which would have been payable under clause (A) of section 21, if death had immediately resulted from the accident."

And for fear that they have allowed excessive amounts here we come across relief.

"Second. By deducting from such amount a sum equal to the payments for the period between the accident and the death, which, if the accident had immediately resulted in death, the employer, by reason of the happening of any of the contingencies mentioned in clause (A) of section 21, would have been relieved from making.

"Third. By deducting from the remainder so ascertained the amount of the compensation paid up to the time of death under clause (B), (C), (D), or (E) of section 21 or under section 22."

I am inclined to believe that if there are a few other deductions provided for upon the death of such employee he will be called upon to make up a deficit due the railroad.

"The amounts so ascertained shall be paid to the dependents, if any (if not, nothing will be paid), of such employee, living at the time of his death, in the same amounts and subject to the same contingencies as if compensation had been payable to them under clause (A) of section 21 by reason of their having been dependent at the time of the accident: Provided, That should an employee who sustains an injury resulting in permanent partial disability die from cause other than the injury at any time, the liability of the employer shall not exceed the unpaid balance of the amount which, if the injured employee had lived, would have been paid under the terms of any agreement, award, findings, or judgment, or under clause (D), section 21, or under section 22."

Again protecting and safeguarding the railroad against the widow and orphan.

"SEC. 24. That if, in an accident, an employee receive an injury resulting in permanent partial disability and in the same accident receive additional injury which, by itself, entitles him to compensation, or if he be injured in the service of the same employer while entitled to or receiving payments for a previous injury, the amount of the monthly payment to him for such combined injuries shall be computed as for a single injury as provided for and limited by section 20 hereof, but in such case the periods of time prescribed for such injuries, severally, shall be added together: Provided, That where any such period is less than three months the same shall not be added, but shall be disregarded."

Additional discrimination, additional limitation, and subtraction.

"If an employee receive an injury which of itself would only cause permanent partial disability, but which combined with a previous injury does in fact cause permanent total disability, the employer shall only be liable as for the permanent partial disability, so far as the subsequent injury is concerned."

Thousands of railroad employees are injured twice, three times, and sometimes even a greater number of times. Again this provision discriminates against them, and, notwithstanding that in many cases under this provision he will be permanently disabled and thereby unable ever again to provide for his family, he will not be able to recover the compensation which he should receive.

Gentlemen, many of these provisions are dangerous, but paragraph 7 of section 21 is more dangerous than the rest, because in that provision you invite and encourage railroads to employ foreign labor because it will be cheaper to kill a foreigner than an American citizen. That section must be carefully studied, because there is no one here who is desirous of throwing the American laboring man out of employment.

Mr. FLOYD. Let me see if I understand your point. If a man is an American and he is employed on a railroad, then under the provisions of this bill you must take care of his dependent, under the terms of the bill.

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOYD. But if he is a foreigner, there is no provision in the bill for paying any compensation to his dependents?

Mr. SABATH. With the exception that if he has a widow or dependent child or children living abroad one year's salary is to be paid her or them.

Mr. FLOYD. Your point is it will encourage the railroads to employ foreigners instead of American citizens to work on the railroads?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir; as it will be cheaper to kill them.

Mr. HOWLAND. Is not this bill on all fours with Gov. Wilson's bill of New Jersey?

Mr. SABATH. I regret that I did not study Gov. Wilson's bill. My hands were full following the commission bill and my own bill.

Mr. HOWLAND. The reason why I asked that question is that I have received resolutions complaining that the bill of the New Jersey governor discriminated against the foreigner.

Mr. SABATH. If the New Jersey act has the same provision, I am not surprised that you are receiving protests and complaints, as the American people are fair and just and do not approve of discrimination. It is a provision which is unfair and unjust.

Mr. HARDWICK. This bill is not on all fours with the bill recommended in 1908 by President Roosevelt.

Mr. SABATH. No. President Roosevelt only recommended workman compensation after, as I have been informed, he had seen the draft of my bill [laughter] and before I had a chance and an opportunity to introduce it. But I was very glad that he did, and welcome aid and assistance from every quarter. I assure you I was not opposed to his approval of my bill, notwithstanding the fact that he sent the message the day before I had a chance to introduce the bill in the House. But that shows that he then possessed a great deal of energy, and some of it is still stored up to the present time. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWLAND. How did he come to see your bill, which he recommended?

Mr. SABATH. I did not desire to go into that, but as long as you ask the question I will make that plain. When I arrived in Washington I started to look for some one to help me to go over my bill and inform me whether it was constitutional. I never claimed to be a constitutional lawyer, and no one ever charged me with it. Therefore I did not desire to introduce the very first bill that would appear on its face unconstitutional. I was recommended to a certain gentleman who has been for many years in the employ of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a man of ability, and a man who, it was claimed, knew how to draw bills. I sent for him and informed him that I was willing to pay him to aid and assist me in perfecting the bill so that it would be constitutional.

It was just a few months after the Supreme Court had declared the liability act of 1906 to be unconstitutional. I was requested by him to let him have my draft of the bill. He had it there for a few days. I wondered why he did not return it, and I called him up, and finally he informed me that he must consult with the Secretary as to whether or not he could do the work. That was after about 10 days. Finally I called him up again, and he informed me then that he had talked with the Secretary, and the Secretary had stated that it was not permissible for anyone in the department to aid in drafting this bill. Inasmuch as they were working on a similar bill, this, I believe, was for the purpose of being able to introduce it before I could introduce mine. I said, "Then bring me back the bill." "The Secretary has the bill," he said. Then I made a demand upon the Secretary for the bill. In the meanwhile I was informed that the chairman of the commission had the bill. From the chairman of the commission it traveled to President Roosevelt, as I understand. A few days thereafter I was pleased to note that President Roosevelt had sent a message to the House advocating workman compensation. But in the meanwhile, the day after I finally secured my draft back, I worked day and night with another gentleman whose services I had secured to help me to perfect my draft so as to be able to get it in before the so-called department bill or before the message reached the House, because they were coming fast—but, as usual, President Roosevelt was there before me [laughter], with a message, but not the bill.

Mr. MCCOY. You have heard of the Ananias Club. You are not looking for a membership there, are you?

Mr. SABATH. No; because after that I gave President Roosevelt a great deal of credit for what he had done in advocating workman compensation. He did advocate workman compensation, and has publicly commended me for the labor I put into the bill and into the speech that I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the purpose of enlightening the American people on the principle of the workman-compensation bill, for my honesty in stating that I availed myself of the privilege of the House to insert remarks instead of trying to mislead the country that I had actually delivered the speech on the floor of the House. Right here I desire to state that I was obliged to insert it, not being able to secure enough time to enable me to deliver it on the floor.

In that way I have no complaint to make and feel satisfied that he himself did not know that I would be ready to introduce the bill as soon as I was, or he might perhaps have waited a few days with his message. What transpired soon thereafter forces me to the conclusion that he recognized my efforts, as in a short time he requested me to call on him for the purpose of discussing with me this legislation, and in that way has shown me more courtesy and placed in me more confidence than he did in the members of his own party of many years' service, and all this notwithstanding that I was only a new Member.

Mr. WEBB. You do not think he would have sent the message on this subject unless he had seen your bill?

Mr. SABATH. That I do not know. I would not charge him with it; but I hope that the draft which was submitted by me to the gentleman, and which traveled through the department and finally reached the White House, as I was informed, was instrumental in bringing out the message.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Is this bill, introduced in March, 1912, the last one which you introduced?

Mr. SABATH. That is the last one. And right here I desire to say, before you ask me anything more about it, that this last bill of mine includes some of the provisions that are embodied in the commission bill, the same as the commission bill contains many of my clauses and provisions; and the only ones that are really good are those taken from my bill.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Your schedule of compensation is higher than that in the commission bill?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Under your bill no railroad in this country has to pay your schedule of compensation unless it voluntarily elects to come under the operation of your bill?

Mr. SABATH. Yes. I said my bill is so drafted. It is voluntary on the part of the employee as well as the employer.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Did you ever have a dream that if you put enormous amounts in the schedue of compensation and not make them compulsory any railroad in this country would ever adopt it?

Mr. SABATH. I do not think my amounts in this bill are enormous. They are fair. They are lower than are recovered under the present conditions. I make limitations. I admit in the first draft of my bill I did lesire to secure more than probably the railroads could reasonably pay, and that is the reason they assailed my bill and assailed me. But the last two bills are reasonable, and I maintain, Judge BRANTLEY and gentlemen of the committee, that even my bill, H. R. 1, would not increase the operating expenses 1 per cent and the cost would not be as great as many people imagine.

Mr. BRANTLEY. At the same time, under your bill it would be at the pleasure of the railroad whether it would come under its operation or not?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; but I have a few provisions in my bill, Judge, which I am positive would aid the railroads in coming to the conclusion that it would be better for them to adopt it and avail themselves of its benefits. I provide in my bill that if they do not accept it we should impose a certain tax on them; and I believe as Mr. Thom, of the Southern Railway, said, and as I have maintained, that we have that right and the power, especially under the ruling in the Oklahoma bank cases, to tax the railroad companies for this fund, and, where they would not accept, impose a certain tax upon them, and in that way we could get them to accept the provisions of my bill.

Mr. BRANTLEY. I want to ask you a further question. If the railroads do accept it, then under your bill it becomes practically an exclusive remedy, does it not?

Mr. SABATH. No; only to those who have accepted, and in certain cases it does not affect the present civil liability.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Read section 5 of your bill.

Mr. SABATH (reading)—

"SEC. 5. That no common-law or statutory right to recover damages for injury or death sustained by any such employee while engaged in any employment subject to the provisions of this act, other than the compensation herein provided, shall be available to any such employee who has accepted the provisions of this act nor to any such employee's dependents or his legal representatives: Provided, That where the injury to the employee was caused by the failure of the employer to furnish any safety appliance for use in said employment which is now or may hereafter be required by any act of Congress, nothing in this act shall affect the present civil liability of the employer."

As you notice, it provides that the employee may, at his option, accept or reject. There is a proviso in there which provides that where the injury of the employee was "caused by the failure of the employer to furnish any safety appliance for use in said employment which is now or may hereafter be required by any act of Congress, nothing in this act shall affect the present civil liability of the employer."

That was put in for the purpose of forcing the railroad companies to put in all the safety appliances and make travel as safe as possible.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Aside from the fact, if the railroad and the employee elect to go under your compensation law it becomes an exclusive remedy?

Mr. SABATH. If he accepts, yes. I admit that my aim has been, and is now, to eliminate litigation, and that where we give fair compensation under a bill that they should not also have the remedy under the present law. What I contend for is a fair remedy, a fair trial of the remedy which we are giving, and if it works out right, and if the law after it has been in operation a year or two will do what we claim for it, it will then be time enough to eliminate all of the present remedies. But until we are satisfied that this bill will do what is claimed for it I believe we should not deprive those injured and those dependent upon them of the rights that they have under the present liability law.

Mr. HOWLAND. Under this bill of yours you give the railroad company the right to elect whether it shall be under the liability law or under the compensation act, and you give the employee the right also to elect whether he shall come under the compensation act or the liability act?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWLAND. Suppose the railroad company elects to come under the compensation law and the employee elects to insist on his common-law rights?

Mr. SABATH. He would be obliged to give notice. I am trying to eliminate that indirectly as much as I can. But he would have to give 30 days' notice that he does not avail himself of the compensation act.

Mr. HOWLAND. You can not give the right to both to elect different remedies because they might elect different remedies.

Mr. SABATH. They both have the right to elect. They could, because the railroad may elect——

Mr. HOWLAND (interposing). Suppose the railroad wants to come under the compensation bill and the employee wants to come under the liability bill; where are you?

Mr. MCCOY. That is not the way they do it.

Mr. SABATH. Then he would not be obliged to come under the workman compensation. I am satisfied that right from the start 95 per cent—yes, 98 per cent—of the employees would elect to come under a workman-compensation bill if compensation provided therein is as fair as in my bill. But of course if the bill does not provide reasonably fair compensation, naturally they would not elect the compensation law.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like on that point to ask you a question. Your theory is that both the employee and the railroad company must elect to accept the new law or else it is not effective.

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. The railroad company of course would elect to go under the law that would be the most favorable to them and that would allow the smallest amount of damages. The employee would want to go under the law that would give the largest amount of damages. I think that is perfectly natural.

Mr. SABATH. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. NORRIS. How would you ever expect to get both of them to agree to the same law?

Mr. SABATH. In this way: By passing a fair compensation law which would provide for fair and reasonable compensation without delay. I feel confident that within a short space of time that 98 per cent—yes, perhaps 99 per cent—of the employees would elect to come under the workman compensation if they would be satisfied that it really provides fair compensation.

Mr. NORRIS. For the same reason that they would go under that law the railroad company would keep out from under it.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; but I make it effective for the reason that I was not quite sure that the Supreme Court would otherwise declare it constitutional as that tribunal may hold that we are taking property without due process of law. So I make it elective. But I have a clause or two in the bill which will coax the railroads to accept, namely, by providing for a taxation system upon those that do not accept, as Congress has the right to impose such tax. In that way we would coax them along and help them to accept the bill and elect to come under its provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you that provision of the bill before you to which you are now referring?

Mr. SABATH. As to the taxation?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; your coaxing provision, as you call it.

Mr. SABATH. You will pardon the expression.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not find any objection to the expression. But as a matter of information I wanted to know what particular provision in your bill provided for that, in all seriousness. I think in one sense that is not an inapt word for you to use.

Mr. SABATH. It is in section 31 of my bill. It provides:

"That 60 days after the passage of this act every common carrier subject to the regulative power of Congress shall be liable for the following excise taxes for the purpose of paying the administrative expenses of this act and for paying the compensation herein provided for, namely:

"First. There shall be levied, collected, and paid on every car or motor vehicle used in the transportation of persons or property on the lines of every common carrier subject to this act, whether steam or electric line, an excise tax of $6 per year.

"Second. There is hereby levied, and there shall be payable by every telegraph company operated along the line of or connected with any telegraph line built, constructed, or maintained along the line of any railroad and telegraph line to which the United States has granted subsidies, or which telegraph line shall have accepted the provisions of title 65 of the Revised Statutes, an excise tax of $50,000 for an in respect of its plant within the District of Columbia.

"Third. Every express company subject to this act shall pay an excise tax of $5 per year on every wagon or other vehicle used by it in the collection, distribution, and delivery of express matter, and on every car used exclusively by any express company on any line of railroad for the transportation of express matter a tax of $5 per year shall be levied and paid."

The CHAIRMAN. That was the inducement you held out for accepting the provisions of this act?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; there are some other inducements in my other bills.

Mr. NORRIS. You have a tax in there for the purpose of paying the compensation provided for in the act?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. And then you provide that if they accept the bill so that they will have to pay compensation, they do not need to pay the tax; and if they do not accept the bill, and therefore there will be no use for a fund to pay it, then they have to pay the tax?

Mr. SABATH. No; as that tax shall be used only for the purpose of paying this compensation and the cost of enforcing and carrying out of the act.

Mr. NORRIS. There will be none to pay.

Mr. SABATH. If they do not accept, then they pay the tax.

Mr. NORRIS. But that is for the purpose of raising a fund to comply with the provisions of the law?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If the bill is not enforced, if they do not accept it, they do not need that fund?

Mr. SABATH. No. The law would be the law of the land; they must accept or elect to come and avail themselves of all its provisions under that law. Then, in a case where they would refuse, we do that duty for them, providing for those who are injured and killed by imposing a tax, that tax to be collected by the Government and paid in a special fund, out of which fund these injured employees would be provided for and taken care of.

Mr. NORRIS. How do you provide that they should get the money out of that fund?

Mr. SABATH. I have a provision in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. You have a provision for that?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir; I provide for that. I shall read the provision to you:

"Whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have certified to the Secretary of the Treasury that any such common carrier has not complied with the orders of said commission in respect of paying any compensation due, it shall be the duty of said Secretary of the Treasury to collect the excise taxes hereby imposed during or for such time or times as said carrier is not complying with any lawful orders of said commission with respect to the matters contained in this act. Said excise taxes under the provisions of this act when collected and paid into the Treasury of the United States shall be, and they are hereby, specifically reappropriated, and shall constitute a permanent appropriation, to be called the "Federal compensation fund," to pay any compensation not paid by any carrier or person subject to this act, pursuant to any lawful order of said commission, and to meet the necessary expenses of administering this act; and all acts heretofore passed in aid of pensioners of the United States in respect of limitation of attorneys' fees, proof of claim, allowance, and payment and audit, are hereby, as far as applicable, extended to any funds exacted, collected, appropriated, and disbursed pursuant to this act."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Hardwick is here, and I know he is anxious to go on, but at this late hour it will be impossible, as I have transgressed on the goodness of the committee in taking up nearly three hours, and I do not desire to take up a great deal more time. But before I conclude I desire, however, to ask the privilege to embody in the hearing my last two bills.

The CHAIRMAN. You may do that.

Mr. SABATH. And the first speech that was made by me on workman compensation in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that may be done.

Mr. NORRIS. You do not want to incorporate the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the hearing?

Mr. SABATH. No; not all that I have said on this subject.

Mr. NORRIS. The speech is already printed in it.

Mr. SABATH. I know; but I would like to incorporate it here, because it contains much information that those interested may read if in these hearings and may not in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am under the impression that some may read it and be benefited by it.

I have also with me communications from several labor organizations that are opposed to this bill, as well as from the lodge of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they opposed to it in its present form?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir. Also a communication of protest against the bill from Pennsylvania employees west of Pittsburgh, and they claim they are speaking for the majority of railroad employees. I shall read extracts from the communication and insert the others. [Reading:]

EXHIBIT 1.

Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
Member of Congress.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, members of the advisory board of the relief department of the Pennsylvania Lines West, who were elected by and represent the contributing members of the relief department, respectfully request that you hear our protest against a proposed law which has been introduced in Congress as bill S. 5382 and known as the employers liability and workmen's compensation law, and ask that you use your influence to defeat this measure for many reasons, a few of which we will endeavor to make clear to you.

We represent, on the lines west of Pittsburgh, about 48,000 members. The lines east of Pittsburgh have a membership of about 90,000. The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway has a membership of about 26,000, and the Baltimore & Ohio system a membership in excess of 100,000. The aggregate, as you will see, makes a total which amounts to quite a large percentage of the total railway employees of the country.

The promoters and sponsors for this proposed legislation are undertaking to give out the impression that the employees want this law, and while it has been indorsed in some of the meetings of the organizations, this has been accomplished through an improper understanding of the proposition and through the willingness of certain classes of employees to take up anything which seems to be a fight against the employing company.

We are not in favor of fixing a price on the life or limb of a railway employee at a less figure than that which may be fixed for any other citizen. We believe that if an employing company is at fault in case of death or disablement it should pay as much to an employee as it is compelled to pay to a patron of the company.

We believe that this law if enforced will cause more contention on the part of employers for the purpose of avoiding the payment of damage claims than we now have. It is a mistaken idea to imagine that the employer will pay each claim under this law without a protest.

In the comments which we have read on the proposed law attention is frequently called to the fact that the proposition is indorsed and recommended by President Taft. We will say that in view of an approaching election it would be foolishness for him not to indorse it after having been induced to believe that the million or more voters who are interested in the proposition want it. We believe, however, that this is a mistake.

Now I insert a communication from Mr. Callahan, representative of the Illinois Central Railway Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen:

EXHIBIT 2.

Hon. A. J. SABATH, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: After considerable discussion and debate with relation to the compensation act now pending before the House, it was decided by a number of railroad men that I write Mr. J. C. McShane, a lawyer of distinction and reputation, and who is regarded as a friend of the railroad men, for his opinion upon the compensation act passed by the Senate.

His reply is herewith attached.

Let me say briefly this measure does not meet with the approval of the rank and file of our organization.

Yours, truly,

M. D. CALLAHAN,
7349 Madison Avenue, Local Committeeman
Illinois Central Railway Brotherhood Railroad Trainmen.

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN, LODGE NO. 752.

GENTLEMEN: I am sending you herewith a copy of a resolution adopted by the above lodge at its last regular meeting, held April 28, 1912. I also desire to state that the Local Chairman's Association of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen at its last regular meeting, held May 6, 1912, at the Hotel Sherman, Chicago, by a unanimous vote passed resolutions requesting that action looking to the passage of the "employers' liability and workmen's act" be withheld until such time as the employees affected can familiarize themselves with the provisions contained therein.

The above-mentioned association represents the many thousands of railroad trainmen in and about Chicago.

JOHN DELANO,

Vice Chairman of the Local Chairman's Association of Chicago.

Also from a committee representing Division No. 175 of the Order of Railway Conductors of America.

EXHIBIT 4.

ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS OF AMERICA,
DIVISION NO. 175,
Memphis, Tenn., June 16, 1912.

Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By unanimous vote of the members present at several meetings of Division No. 175, O. R. C., and on June 2, 1912, the chief conductor appointed a special committee of three to file protest of this division against the employers' liability and workmen's compensation act which recently passed the United States Senate and is now pending before the House.

Yours, truly,

B. J. JACOWAY,
A. C. MULFORD,
W. G. BEANLAND,
Committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Who are those men who have signed it? Are they officials of different organizations?

Mr. SABATH. They are members of the executive board of the Pennsylvania lines and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, as well as the Baltimore & Ohio.

Mr. NORRIS. How are we to do if we are trying to find out what these railroad men want? Here are other men, who are recognized heads of these organizations, advocating this bill. Who are these men who are protesting against it? What official connection do they have with these railroad organizations?

Mr. SABATH. I am only giving the committee what I have, and I deem it my duty to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault, Mr. SABATH. I am only asking for information. I would like to know who these people are.

Mr. SABATH. I am of this opinion, that the great majority of the railroad employees are not familiar with this bill and I feel satisfied if they would become acquainted with all the provisions of the bill the great majority of them would be here in opposition. That is my honest opinion. I have been in communication with many of these societies and orders and with nearly all of the bodies. I have sent out nearly 100,000 communications to various organizations on this question, and in all those communications I made them believe that workmen's compensation will provide actual compensation; that it will eliminate litigation; that it will eliminate all these drawn-out lawsuits and bring about a better feeling between the employee and the employer. A great many of these men were under the impression that this bill which the commission has drafted, which is before you to-day, will do all these things. For that reason many of the organizations went on record for this bill, believing, as I have stated, that it will do all I claimed for my bill.

I am sorry to say that the bill does not do so. Still, I am pleased that they have recognized the principle underlying my bill and the principle of workmen's compensation. It can be made a good bill by this committee if amended and the objectionable features I have pointed out are eliminated.

So you see I am by myself. I do not agree with the commission nor with the railroad men, nor do I agree with some of the gentlemen who are opposed to this bill on the principle that it takes care in the same way of those who have been negligent in the performance of their duties as of those who have not been so negligent.

Mr. Chairman, I have given a great deal of my time and study to this proposition, and I believe that if the laboring people of this country would be thoroughly familiar with the draft of the commission bill they would be opposed to it. They are, however, in favor of workmen's compensation that will provide compensation and eliminate litigation. This bill provides compensation in some cases; that compensation, however, is unreasonably low and does not eliminate litigation. I am afraid that under this bill, if it is passed as it is at present, you will find there will be more litigation than we have under the present law.

Mr. FLOYD. The effect of this bill will be to repeal the employers' liability act of 1908?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOYD. Suppose we make it compulsory, and the Supreme Court, for any reason not discovered by the authors of the bill, should hold that this bill is unconstitutional; would we be without any remedy at all?

Mr. SABATH. The bill repeals the 1908 and 1910 acts by implication. I answered that question a few moments ago while you were out. I said then that it would be dangerous to make the remedy exclusive. My reason for making the statement is this: The bill provides an exclusive remedy. Section 3 provides that, "except as provided herein, no such employer shall be civilly liable for any personal injury to or death of any such employee resulting from any such accident," which means, in simple words, that such injured employee can not maintain any action under the present laws and is entitled only to the remedy given him in this bill. Then, if after two or three years the Supreme Court holds this law unconstitutional, I am inclined to believe that all these thousands of injured employees who have been maimed and crippled between the time this act goes into effect and the time the Supreme Court might hold the bill unconstitutional will be deprived of their present legal rights under the liability laws now in force.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Supreme Court would probably not declare the repealing clause unconstitutional, even if the balance of it was so declared. We can repeal a law even if we can not do anything else.

Mr. BRANTLEY. This law does not repeal the employers' liability act in terms, and consequently if this law should be declared unconstitutional the liability law will still be in force.

Mr. HARDWICK. I take the contrary position to that, and I would like to be heard on that point.

Mr. SABATH. My point is this: If they should come under this compensation act and would be deriving compensation under it for two or three years, and after that time the Supreme Court should say that the act was unconstitutional, would they not be deprived of proceeding under the present liability law?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Because they have two years in which to file the suit.

Mr. SABATH. In all probability they will take it for granted that it is constitutional and will not file a suit under the present law; in fact, they could not. And the result would be that their claims or rights would be outlawed.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Under the act they can still do it.

Mr. SABATH. I can't see how. I think they should not be deprived of any remedy that they now have until we will be satisfied with the working and constitutionality of the law, so if the law be declared unconstitutional they would not be deprived of their present rights.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I realize that it is late and that I have taken up a great deal of your time, therefore I shall conclude my remarks; but before I do so I wish to express to you my appreciation of your kind indulgence and attention, and to assure you that, were it not for the fact that workman compensation is near and dear to me, I would not have imposed on your good nature as I have. But, having devoted a great deal of time, labor, and study to the subject, and seeing my efforts in behalf of the thousands upon thousands annually maimed—and by judge-made law disinherited—citizens rewarded, and the principle I have contended for adopted, I must be excused if in my anxiety to improve and perfect the bill I detained you as long as I did.

Mr. Chairman, under the permission granted me, I now desire to insert and wish that the following be made a part of the hearings: First, a copy of a letter dated February 15, 1908, sent out by me to all of the Members of Congress and to the newspapers and magazines of this country, as well as to all international unions; second, a letter of May, 1908, mailed to the above names; third, a letter mailed by me April 21, 1909, to all the governors, lieutenant governors, and members of the various State legislatures, labor organizations, etc.; fourth, communication of May 26, 1909; fifth, hearing of first statement made by me before the committee; sixth, a general letter dated May 28, 1910; and seventh, statement prepared and issued by me comparing my bill with the commission bill.

EXHIBIT 1 A.

FEBRUARY 15, 1908.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am mailing you, under separate cover, H. R. 16739, introduced by me on the 3d, and reintroduced on the 10th instant. The bill provides for compensation and benefits to employees solely engaged in interstate commerce, including such as are subject to Federal navigation and shipping laws, who sustain injury or death; it further provides for a scale and condition of compensation, benefits, and injuries; creates a commission of injury awards, consisting of five commissioners to be appointed by the President, and gives the commission full power under the interstate-commerce act; prescribes method of procedure; and provides for an appropriation of $350,000 for the work of the commission.

This bill is modeled after laws which are in operation for many years in England, Germany, Austria, New Zealand, and other countries that are progressive in this direction, and give general satisfaction.

I trust that you will concur with me, in that the subject matter is of vital importance, and that you will find some spare moments to read this bill. If not asking too much, I would be pleased to have your views on the same.

Yours, very truly,

A. J. SABATH.

(Copy of bill and letter sent to all Congressmen and Senators, newspaper men, and international unions.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, May —, 1908.

DEAR SIR: Herewith inclosed I am sending you my amended copy of my compensation bill, which provides for compensation to all employees who may be injured while solely engaged in interstate commerce. It further provides for the creation of a commission of injury awards, granting it certain powers over all carriers who are subject to the regulative power of Congress. This bill has the approbation of many Senators, Representatives, and a great number of civic organizations, as well as that of President Roosevelt.

I am also sending you herewith a bill of the same nature which, however, is applicable to the States.

I would be pleased to have your views on these.

Very respectfully,

A. J. SABATH.

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1909.

MY DEAR SIR: Herewith inclosed I am sending you a copy of my compensation bill (the first of its kind ever introduced in this country), which has been indorsed by President Roosevelt, who made it a subject for one of his special messages to the past Congress. This bill has the indorsement of labor unions throughout the United States, and it was the basis for the plank on workmen's compensation in the Democratic national platform of 1908.

I have reintroduced this bill with some slight modifications, and it is the first bill introduced in the Sixty-first Congress.

In order that you may obtain a more definite knowledge of its scope, I am sending you also a copy of my speech in support of this measure.

Very truly, yours,

A. J. SABATH.

EXHIBIT 4 A.

DEAR SIR: The present method of requiring an injured employee to sue the employer is both antiquated, vicious, and produces strife and contention instead of rendering prompt, certain, and definite justice. My compensation bill, H. R. 1, is based upon the existing laws of England and Germany, and it ignores the ancient legal fictions of contributory negligence, assumption of risk, and fellow servants, defenses urged in all personal-injury suits by the employer. Statistics prove beyond the pale of doubt that on the vast systems of railroads in the United States one employee is killed or injured every time that seven minutes elapse. The compensation act would substitute for the bitterness engendered by the litigation a prompt payment of an amount which at first would be small, but after the principle is established would be increased. For one excessive verdict that is now allowed to stand, nine verdicts are set aside by the courts for one reason or another.

The bill proposes to establish a series of clauses in statutory form, and these must be accepted by the corporations sought to be regulated as a condition precedent for contracts by the United States with railroads engaged in carrying the mail. In respect of vessels they are absolutely subject to the jurisdiction of the Congress as long as they use navigable waters of the United States. The contract features of the bill have no application to them, as they are absolutely subject to Federal regulation—and the Congress from the earliest times has regulated the relations between the owners of vessels and their crews. The legality of this act can not be attacked; it is invulnerable to constitutional objections. And the reason why mail routes rather than interstate commerce is the basis of regulation is that Congress is absolutely supreme in respect of granting or withholding payments of money, and therefore can regulate the terms of service on these mail routes. The freedom of contract is in no way impaired. The entire act is one of contract which the carrier must accept as part consideration for the privilege of carrying or transporting the mail. The mail route as the basis of regulation becomes important, because, if adopted in this act, no question of (a) conflict with police power of the State can arise; and (b) to what extent intrastate commerce can not affect the contract.

Under the Sabath compensation bill millions of workmen will be benefited, such as railroad employees, street car employees, telephone and telegraph employees, seamen, and many others whose work is in connection with matters pertaining to mail routes.

Provision is made in the bill which permits the employee to elect or choose whether he desires to avail himself of the provisions of the bill, or if he should wish to enforce his rights in a court of law under the present method of procedure.

The scale of compensation embodied in the bill is based in the main on the United States Pension Office scale.

With reference to the cost of carrying out the provisions of the bill, it may be said that but 14 per cent of the moneys expended by the corporations in defending personal-injury claims ultimately reaches the injured workman or his legal representatives. Eighty-six per cent of the moneys so expended are required to defray the attorney's fees, cost of investigating claims, preparation of cases for trial, witness fees, court costs, stenographers' charges, printing of appeal briefs, and other incidentals. These percentages therefore show conclusively that the injured workman is at a great disadvantage in the courts of the country when he seeks to recover for injuries sustained. The passage of this bill will give him relief in the premises.

A. J. SABATH.

EXHIBIT 5 A.

FIRST STATEMENT MADE BY MR. SABATH BEFORE JUDICIARY SUBCOMMITTEE, 1909.

The theory of American law is that the contract between the employer and his employee, known in the common law as "his servant," is ample to take care of the person who is injured by reason of the contract. The law furthermore proceeds on the theory that the damages may be sought primarily against the wrongdoer. As a matter of fact, strictly speaking, the injured person has no redress, because the person who primarily caused the wrong is financially unable to respond in damages. The law then allows an action against the master at common law on formal proof, with the burden upon the person injured to show negligence upon the part of the master, to sustain a cause of action. Justice to the injured employee or in the event of death resulting from the injury, then the widow or next of kin of the deceased, is practically lost sight of by reason of the amazing mass of legal jugglery and hair-splitting distinctions handed down by the judges. The administration of the law has become so refined, delicate, and neat, for the purpose of maintaining the rights of the defendants (usually corporations and therefore absolutely subject to the legislative power), that the more important questions, the questions of humanity and justice to the plaintiff, are utterly forgotten in the defense of vested rights.

The adherence to a rule of law which was harsh when it started, which has become unjust in its operation, which under the totally changed industrial conditions under which great operations of manufacturing, of commerce, and of interstate commerce must be carried on, becomes a pernicious and dangerous form, because under the guise of exercising the law it brings about a denial of justice and a consequent distrust for the courts. The method which has been pursued by the courts in enforcing the strict letter of the law has brought about a feeling that injustice is done to the employee in nearly every instance, which injustice is not due to the administration of the law, but to the inherent injustice of the theory and its perverse construction. The litigation which is necessary to enforce the rights of these persons at common law brings out the extreme of the law, which is always injustice.

The plaintiffs in these cases are our maimed fellow citizens, or, in the event of death, their widows or guardians ad litem for their orphans. In no case do they stand before the court equally prepared with a great corporation which defends the action. It is absurd on the part of any person who has ever practiced even a few years in any court to say that the poor man can hire a great lawyer. His social and economic condition, his lack of relation to the great leaders of the bar, his very maimed condition or the depressed position, occasioned through whatever loss it might be as the proximate result of the injury sustained, all prevent him from having access to any except the ordinary persons who take these cases on contingent fees. That is the average rule. But for argument's sake let us assume that the widow or injured person has the very best counsel; that although he has been defeated in one court, appeals and appeals, and follows his first victory from the lower courts to the supreme court, or even to the Supreme Court of the United States, until the law ultimately says that the defendant must pay damages. A careful investigation into the various State reports has convinced me that the pluckiest and quickest litigants never get a final determination under four years, and that cases have been in the circuit court of appeals (United States), Erie Railway Co. v. Kane, four times (118 Fed. Rep., 223; 142 F. R., 682; 155 F. R., 118), and the litigation has lasted 10 long and weary years. The accident to Kane occurred December 17, 1897; the circuit court of appeals handed down its opinion June 26, 1907. In cases of great historical importance, such as Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., the injury took place within four days after the safety-appliance act took effect, in August, 1900. The action was finally decided by the Supreme Court on December 19, 1904 (196 U. S., 1), and finally in May, 1908, eight years after Johnson was injured, he received a slight sum by way of settlement with the company.

In the Schlemmer case the injury took place within a day or two after the safety-appliance act went into effect. The case was decided by the Supreme Court on March 4, 1907 (205 U. S., 1), in favor of Schlemmer's widow, who, upon the second trial, obtained not very long ago a verdict against the carrier, and the action is now on its indeterminable route of delay to the higher State courts, and possibly will again return to the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, what do you think becomes of the widow in the interim? What care is taken of the children, and what has the State done to relieve itself of the duty which it owes to Schlemmer and to Johnson and to thousands and thousands of railway employees similarly situated all over the country? The litigation which these people are forced to undertake under the process of our common law, even if successful, is inefficacious. The fruits of the litigations are wasted in attorney's fees, court reporters' fees, printing cases and costs, and to the repayment of debts necessary to maintain the families. The social standard of the survivors has been lowered or else the families have gone to pieces; the maimed man, if he has not died of his injuries, has become a pauper and an object of charity; the children have been taken from school; the families have been split up and separated, perhaps forever.

Or let us take the case of a woman who was injured through the violation of the master in not guarding his machinery. St. Louis Cordage Co. v. Miller (126 Fed. Rep., 495) is a case in which Walter Sanborn, circuit judge of the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit, wrote a very painstaking, carefully thought out, and exquisitely inhuman opinion. The woman, after having had her hand mashed in a cog, was thrown out of court. The judge writing the opinion of the court claimed that although the factory act of Missouri protected her, yet she assumed the risk of her employment and must go forth without damages. Now, what can a factory hand do who has had a right hand or arm mashed? The probabilities are that she is unfit for domestic employment; her tastes, her habits have been fixed; the court throws her out. If there is any method for that woman to earn her living except by throwing herself upon the tender mercies of human kind, it is not due to any care that the State has taken to protect her from the prospective evils; and surely the State owes these people some kind of a fair chance. These are our fellow citizens.

The courts will say that the laborer is free; that he chooses his occupation; that if he takes up a dangerous occupation he takes the risk—he does it with his eyes open; he is compensated for it, and that his wages in part may be used, if properly employed, toward buying insurance in some society or company to compensate him for the risk which he is bound to take. Is it not a truism, which must only be stated to be understood, that the choice or freedom of the laborers is entirely illusory; that they have no choice; that the fiction which claims to treat them as free agents is overcome by the actualities of their conditions, which make wage slaves of them all; that the wages are always so small and purchase so little that adequate self-insurance is impossible, and the very, very few of them have any insurance which will keep their families out of the poorhouse?

It is well known that employees in railroad train service are unable to procure insurance in any of the old-line companies except at rates that are practically prohibitive, while most of the companies and societies absolutely refuse to accept such risks under any consideration. Certain of the companies will write 5, 10, and 15 year endowment policies for switchmen—a small portion of the employees under consideration—at premiums based upon a 20-year advance in age; thus, for instance, a switchman aged 25 years may obtain such a policy by paying the 45-year endowment premium rate. Inasmuch as insurance premium rates are based upon broad observation and are always the result of careful and accurate consideration, this fact is vastly significant. It means that the man who embraces the occupation of railroad switchman thereby at once cuts 20 years off his reasonable expectancy of life. If there is any compensating advantage in this occupation to offset the horror of this grim fact I have failed to discover it in more than 10 years' close observation of the conditions of railway labor.

Being denied the benefits of ordinary insurance, railroad employees have been compelled to establish and maintain insurance societies of their own. Those societies are never called upon to pay death claims as a result of old age. Their payments, however, on account of railroad accidents are surprisingly large and in most of the organizations represent a major portion of the total claims paid. In 1908 the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, with a membership of about 90,000, composed of conductors, brakemen, switchmen, and baggagemen, paid 1,512 claims, amounting to about $1,750,000.

Why should this enormous toll of life and treasure be exacted from these employees? If the efficient operation of the Nation's transportation system requires the terrible sacrifice of lives and limbs, it is more to the point and more akin to justice that this burden should be assumed by the transportation industry and through it by society as a whole. These employees, when injured through no fault of their own, through a regularly recurring risk which is an incident of their employment, are cast aside and no effort is required by law of the carriers to heal or repair them; these men are abandoned and are left without compensation. When broken in body, maimed, and injured they are forced, under the most disadvantageous circumstances imaginable, to combat the carriers whose commerce they have been pushing through the country.

THE PROFESSIONAL RISK.

The professional risk—that is, the inherent liability of any person employed in railway traffic being killed or injured—is a permanent and continuous risk. It is a risk which the man can not shift. In the case of death by a railroad accident no question of the employees' inattention, stupidity, carelessness, or similar defenses urged by the defendants can well be urged. It is as much a part of the business of the carrier to pay for the injury of the person who handles the traffic as it is to replace equipment retired from service.

The carriers maintain a fund for the replacement of wrecked or worn-out equipment. But the human being, our fellow citizen, of whom one risks being killed or injured every time seven minutes of the day or night elapse, if wrecked, as a consequence of his professional risk, so as to make him unfit for further service, is cast aside, and the carrier assumes no responsibility whatever for his condition. He must assume his own risk, must bear his own damage, as though it occurred by reason of his fault or his negligence, when, as a matter of fact, his damage is as much the result of the operation of the property as is the damage to locomotives and cars, bridges, and buildings, roadway and track, for all of which the carrier provides without question.

I do not care whether the railways recoup themselves for the additional expense involved in paying compensation to their employees by raising the rates or by charging extra passenger fares, or by decreasing the amount of free baggage that they haul. Directly this would affect a very small portion of the community. The freight charges might affect a still larger portion of the community, but at all events it is proper that the community which indirectly causes the railways to be so inhuman to the fellow citizens of us all should permit a recoupment, because in the last instance the people at large pay for the maimed and injured. They do this by taking care of those survivors of those thousands of railroad men whose families have fallen in the scale of life simply through the utterly inadequate protection afforded them in our law.

This bill provides for compensation and benefits to employees solely engaged in occupations or trades connected with such businesses which are subject to the regulative power of Congress, to be paid by persons carrying on such businesses to employees injured, and to change the general law for injuries received on mail routes, including such as are subject to the existing Federal navigation and shipping laws. It further provides for a scale and condition of compensation, benefits, and injuries; creates a commission of injury awards consisting of three commissioners to be appointed by the President, and granting said commission full power to carry out the provisions of this bill. It further prescribes a method of procedure and provides for an appropriation of $50,000,000 for the work of the commission.

With the exception of our country and Turkey, all other civilized nations having railroads have compensation acts. Under this bill persons who are injured have their choice of remedies. They can either sue in the courts as heretofore, bearing the burden of the proof, or else they can avail themselves of the compensation features provided in the bill.

EXHIBIT 6 A.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 28, 1910.

MY DEAR SIR: The inclosed bill (H. R. 25334) is an amplification of H. R. 16061, which I introduced in the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, being the first bill introduced in Congress which embodied the principles of "workmen's compensation." In this Congress I introduced H. R. 1, upon which I secured hearings before the Judiciary Committee. The hearings developed a number of objections, which were pointed out by lawyers representing some of the railway companies as well as by some of the members of the committee. To meet these objections I redrafted the bill.

The object of my workmen's compensation law is to change the present unjust method of settling damages for the regularly recurring injuries to employees of railroads and other carriers and giving the injured employee, or in the event of his injuries resulting in death, then, to his surviving dependents, immediate and material relief in place of the uncertainty of a suit at law for damages.

With the exception of the United States and Turkey, every country on the Continent has in operation a system of "workmen's compensation," and the reports conclusively show that its operation meets with universal approval alike from employer and employee.

The tendency of a "workmen's compensation" law is to stop the strife existing between the employer and employee under the present status of industry and law.

It relieves the community from supporting hundreds of thousands of workmen who sustained injuries while engaged in hazardous occupations.

In the event the workman is killed in the pursuit of such employment, his family or dependents are provided for.

It provides for immediate relief and obviates the necessity now in vogue of bringing suit and waiting many years for its final determination in the courts, during which time the entire burden of responsibility rests upon the employee or his dependents—left to shift for themselves without any relief.

It prevents litigation, thus relieving the congestion of the courts.

It will prevent perjury, which is so prevalent in personal-injury suits, and the waste of money occasioned by excessive judgments.

My bill proposes the enactment of a certain and limited compensation not exceeding in any case $75 per month, and ceases with the death of the annuitant, the remarriage of the widow, as well as with the arrival at age 16 of the children of an employee who was killed.

The bill is strictly limited to employments subject to the regulative power of Congress.

It provides for the creation of a commission to carry out the provisions of the bill.

I am firmly convinced that its enactment into law will effect a material saving by reason of the decreased expense and cumulative interest charges, etc., resulting from the annual payment of a small annuity to many, rather than an exorbitant lump sum to few.

I am of the opinion that every constitutional objection which might be raised in the premises can be successfully overcome.

I bespeak your earnest and careful consideration for said bill.

Very truly, yours,

A. J. SABATH.

EXHIBIT 7 A.

[Addressed: "Dear Sir," to newspapers and magazine; "My Dear Colleague," to Members of House of Representatives; "My Dear Senator," to Members of Senate.]

Your attention is called to the inclosed bill, H. R. 21962, which provides real compensation for employees of common carriers subject to the regulative power of Congress when such employees are killed or injured from any cause arising out of and in the course of their employment.

The bill establishes an elective system of compensation and does not deprive either employers or employees of their rights of citizenship by confining them to an exclusive remedy. The scale of compensation proposed is fair, without being unduly liberal. It provides for the payment of such amounts as the disabled employee, or his dependents in case of his death, should be justly entitled to, and which are clearly in the interest of the public welfare. The administrative machinery provided is simple, logical, of proven efficiency, and calculated to operate at minimum expense to the public.

This bill was drawn and introduced by me expressly as a substitute for, and an improvement on, the bill presented by the Federal Compensation Commission, which bears the indorsement and approval of the President, and in order that the respective merits of these bills may be understood their salient features will be compared and contrasted, as follows:

1. APPLICATION.

(a) Commission bill: Applies only to common carriers engaged in interstate or foreign commerce by railroad.

(b) My bill: Applies to every common carrier subject to the regulative power of Congress, thus taking in employees of telegraph, telephone, express, and sleeping-car companies engaged in interstate commerce, as well as steamship lines and (inferentially) post roads and mail carriers whether engaged in interstate commerce or not. It also applies to the United States Government with respect to all its civil employees.

2. REMEDY.

(a) Commission bill: Provides an exclusive remedy, thus, in effect, repealing the Federal employers' liability law recently declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, which law was only obtained after years of effort and vast expense on the part of railroad employees and their friends.

(b) My bill: Provides an elective remedy. Neither employees nor employers are deprived of any of their existing statutory or common-law rights, as they are not required to accept the provisions of the bill unless they see fit.

3. SCALE OF COMPENSATION.

(a) Commission bill:

[1] Death: The greatest amount that can be obtained for death is $4,800, which is the sum that would be paid to a widow with children in case the deceased employee's wages amounted to $100 per month or over. This sum would be paid in monthly installments of $50 per month for eight years. The minimum would be just half that amount, paid in the same way. For purposes of calculation no employee's wages are considered to be over $100 nor less than $50 per month. A widow without children would receive 40 per cent of such monthly wages for eight years. Other dependents, such as children and dependent parents, are paid various percentags of such monthly wages according to the degree of their dependency. A widow, or child or children under 16 years old, residing in any foreign country except Canada, would receive a lump sum equal to one year's wages of the deceased employee in lieu of all other payments. No compensation would be paid to any other nonresident dependent.

[2] Disability: Permanent and total, 50 per cent of monthly wages during life (maximum, $50; minimum, $25); temporary total, same as permanent during its continuance; permanent partial, 50 per cent of wages in certain specified cases for varying periods from 4 months minimum to 72 months maximum. In unspecified cases of partial disability payments are to be proportionate to those established in the specified cases and for proportionate periods, in no case exceeding 72 months, the proper proportions to be established by agreement or litigation in accordance with the methods provided by the bill.

If a partially disabled employee secures work after his injury, his compensation shall be 50 per cent of the difference between his wages before he was injured and what he is able to earn after his injury, providing his wages after the injury are not 90 per cent or more of what he received before his injury, in which case he is paid nothing.

No payment is made for disability that does not continue for more than 14 calendar days.

If a disabled employee, while at work after his injury, should receive a second injury which of itself would only cause partial disability, but which combined with his previous injury does in fact cause permanent total disability, he is paid only for the partial disability.

(b) My bill:

[1] Death: Eight times the average annual earnings of deceased employee, but in no event less than $5,000 nor more than $7,500, to be paid the widow, children, parents, or other lineal heirs of deceased in monthly installments in proportion to their dependency, installments for the first six months to be paid the widow or children in the same amounts and at the same intervals as the employee received his wages while living; after six months payments to be made in monthly installments equal to 60 per cent of the monthly wages, but not less than $30 nor more than $75 per month until total amount due has been paid. Monthly payments may be computed to a lump sum upon proper order of a probate court after full hearing and determination that such commutation would be for the interest of the beneficiaries and not prejudicial to the public welfare. A widow and (or) children resident in any foreign country shall receive the whole amount of compensation due in a lump sum at once; other nonresident dependents to be paid compensation the same as though they were residents of this country, in lump sums proportionate to their dependency.

[2] Disability: Permanent, total. Sixty per cent of annual earnings for life, in no case less than $30 nor more than $75 per month, payments to be made monthly; temporary, total, 60 per cent of average weekly earnings as long as the disability lasts, payments to be made weekly, and not to be less than $10 nor more than $18 per week. If disability lasts more than seven days, compensation is to begin from the day of the injury; if less than seven days, no compensation other than medical attendance is to be paid. For partial disability compensation is to be paid at the rate of 60 per cent of the difference between what the employee earned before his injury and what he is earning or able to earn after the injury. If he is able to earn as much after as before the injury, compensation stops.

If a partially disabled employee who is drawing compensation for a previous injury receives a second injury which of itself would only cause partial disability, but which, combined with his previous injury, does in fact cause permanent total disability, he receives compensation for his total disability, and if the two injuries were received in the service of two employers the compensation payment is divided between them.

4. ADMINISTRATION.

(a) Commission bill: Compensation may be settled by agreement between the parties, agreements to be filed with officials, known as "adjusters," created by the bill. If not settled by agreement, proceedings are to be had before an adjuster, whose finding in the matter is subject to review by the district court, and to such further court proceedings as the parties may deem necessary for the protection of their rights. Appeals and writs of error may be taken from the district courts to the circuit courts of appeal and to the Supreme Court of the United States.

One adjuster is to be appointed by the district court in each judicial district of the United States, and additional adjusters may be appointed from time to time whenever the Attorney General of the United States shall deem necessary. These adjusters are to be paid not less than $1,800 nor more than $3,000 per year, and expenses. They are required to maintain offices at their places of residence.

(b) My bill: Compensation may be settled by agreement between the parties, agreements to be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. If not settled by agreement, compensation is to be settled by an examiner of the commission to be known as "arbitrator," whose finding in the matter, after approval by the commission, is to be final and conclusive, subject to appeal by either party to the commission, and to further appeal to the Court of Commerce.

Arbitrators are to be appointed by the commission as need requires. They are to be paid such salaries as the commission may determine, in the same manner as its special agents and examiners are employed and paid. The commission is empowered to make such rules and adopt such methods of administration as will best give effect to the declared purpose and intent of the law.

Provision is made for the payment of compensation to those whose employers default, by means of an excise tax to be levied and collected from those employers who fail to observe the terms of the compensation agreements or awards, or who do not elect to accept the terms of the bill. The amounts collected by this tax are turned into the Treasury and reappropriated for the purpose of paying compensation due and not otherwise provided for and meeting the expense of the administration.

It is declared to be the intent and purpose of the bill to place the financial burden of death and injury to employees upon the industries involved, and the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to recognize and give effect to this policy in any proceedings before it affecting rates.

The commission bill, in my opinion, does not afford employees the relief they are entitled to and which in justice should be given them. Its scale of payments is unduly low, and it betrays great solicitude for the assumed rights of the employer and the protection of property, while almost entirely ignoring the rights of the employee and the protection of those rights of common humanity which should be the distinguishing mark of our advanced and advancing civilization. In the one instance where, by the provision in section 24 of the bill, a totally and permanently disabled employee is only permitted to draw compensation for partial disability, the harsh, cruel, and sordid character of the bill is admirably illustrated.

Neither is the commission bill, in my opinion, in any respect calculated to establish a correct public policy for this great country. By its palpable discrimination against foreigners it creates a motive for employers to discriminate against American citizens in the matter of employment, because it will be cheaper under the commission bill to kill and disable foreigners than it will be to kill and disable American citizens. The man who suffers the burden of disability or death in the industries of our country should be given all the benefits of every remedy allowed by law for such death or disability, irrespective of citizenship, and that is what I have attempted to give him in my bill.

If it was the purpose of the commission bill to avoid litigation and expense, that purpose will be wholly defeated by the operation of the bill.

The sections dealing with the adjusters and the court process growing out of their proceedings form an invitation to litigation, and there can be no doubt that the courts would be burdened with compensation litigation should that bill become law to a greater extent even than they are now burdened with personal-injury litigation.

The expense of administration by the method proposed by the commission bill would be enormous and out of all proportion to the results to be accomplished. An adjuster at a minimum salary of $1,800 per year is to be appointed in every judicial district of the United States and one in the District of Columbia. These appointments are required to be made whether they are needed or not. That means a minimum salary list of $138,600 per annum for the 77 districts, to say nothing of traveling, subsistence, and office expenses; and who is there so simple as to believe that all these appointments will be made at the minimum salary? The probability is that many of them will be made at the maximum of $3,000, and a fair estimate of the average salary of the lot would be $2,500. And the Attorney General is empowered to appoint additional adjusters in his discretion. If the commission had exhibited the same solicitude for the welfare of the employees who are the reputed beneficiaries of its proposed legislation as it has for these adjusters who are to furnish its administrative machinery, it would undoubtedly have presented a better bill.

My bill puts the work of administration upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, where it properly belongs. That is a body of known efficiency, having long experience with the affairs of interstate carriers, and having ample authority to obtain necessary information and enforce its orders. It will appoint arbitrators as they are needed, and will undoubtedly be able to accomplish the work with less than half the number of functionaries which the commission bill absolutely requires to be appointed.

Other features of the commission bill might be criticized at length, but this is not the place to enter into all of its bad features. To mention but one, namely, the virtual repeal of the Federal employers' liability law, is to condemn the measure.

The bill here inclosed is the result of long and careful study of this question. It is the eighth measure of the kind that has been introduced by me in Congress, and I firmly believe it to be a just, fair, practicable, and constitutional measure. I earnestly request you to give it careful consideration, and, if it meets with your approval, such support as you are able to render.

Very truly, yours,

A. J. SABATH,
Member of Congress, Fifth Illinois.

Mr. Speaker, during all these years I have worked faithfully for a principle and for a compensation bill that would give immediate relief to all those that are injured and their dependents. However, though at times I have met with the most determined opposition, little did I think that a measure purporting to accomplish this, and which in fact has directly the opposite effect from that intended, would be recommended to this House and seriously considered.

Some of my colleagues state that I should support this bill because it is legislation which I have advocated for these many years. Mr. Speaker, I admit that after I have fought for this legislation for such a long time it is disappointing indeed to be unable to support the bill now under consideration, but I would not be true to the principle for which I have battled, I would not be just to the people, were I to cast my vote for this bill simply because it is termed the "workmen's compensation bill."

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, instead of being called the "workmen's compensation bill" the pending measure ought to be entitled "A bill for the relief of the great railroads of the United States." Instead of being supported on the idea that it is giving something new and desirable to the American workingman engaged in railroad work of an interstate character, it ought to be opposed because it repeals the most generous and complete system of laws for the protection and compensation of these men that the world has ever known—our present Federal employer's liability law, and the amending statutes—and takes from these men, with one hand, rights far greater and benefits far more valuable than those it professes to confer with the other hand. If the men who propose this legislation and support it on this floor and elsewhere really want to help the workingman, really wish to enlarge his rights, really wish to better his condition, why do they not give him legislation of this character, in addition to what he already has? Why do they insist that before they will enact this legislation they must and will repeal every Federal law that with years of labor, of toil, and of conflict, in Congress and in the courts, we have given to these men?

And let me say, in answer to my friend from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], that if he were correct in his statement that the substitution of this legislation for existing law will cost the railroads from forty-eight to sixty million dollars per year, instead of fifteen millions, the railroad lawyers and lobbyists would be here in opposition to this bill as thick as blackberries in summer time, whereas we all know that in fact they are supporting this bill instead of opposing it.

The situation that we face to-night is this: Many Members on both sides of the Chamber are committed to the principle of workmen's compensation. All of the political parties have indorsed it; no one that I know of opposes it. But, outside of a very few men, who knows anything about the provisions of this particular bill, what its real purpose is, or what its real effect would be if it became a law? And yet, without the slightest opportunity for amendment, with only 40 minutes of debate, we are asked to swallow this bill in one dose, without opportunity for amendment or real debate, so far as this House is concerned, although the proponents of the measure have already found it necessary to amend it elsewhere about 150 times within its short legislative life. Consequently, many Members whose duties have not allowed them time to examine into the merits of this particular bill may support it simply because they favor the general principle and do not like to be put in the attitude of having voted against "a compensation bill," to use the very skillful phraseology of Mr. Gompers.

The bill applies, of course, only to employees of railroad companies while such employees are themselves actually engaged in interstate business. Following the rule in the Howard case, it could go no further. It has no application to an employee of an intrastate railroad company or of an interstate railroad company unless such employee is himself engaged in interstate transportation. Let us consider the principle upon which it rests. It is this: When a workingman is engaged in a quasi public industry and is injured or killed while so engaged, he ought to be compensated, or his family ought to be compensated if he is killed, regardless of whether he was at fault, unless willfully reckless or drunk, or whether the master or his fellow servants were at fault. Why? Because the enterprise in which he is engaged is quasi public in its character, is conducted for the benefit of the public, and is necessary for the public comfort, safety, or prosperity. Therefore, the risks incident to the enterprise or industry ought not, in fairness, to be borne by the relatively small number of wage earners engaged therein, upon whose shoulders it is a most grievous burden, but ought to be borne by the general public, for whose benefit the industry is conducted, and upon whom the burden will be comparatively light, because so widely distributed. I submit to the House and to the country that I have stated the doctrine accurately and fairly. It is a great principle, based on sôlid foundations of humanitarian statesmanship and of sound political economy. It is progressive, and yet really conservative, because it is even-handed justice, too long delayed. It was this doctrine that Mr. Roosevelt stood for in his great message to Congress when he urged its application to our interstate railroads. It was this doctrine that Woodrow Wilson stood for in the recent campaign. But I propose to show you that from the fundamental principles that underlie this doctrine Mr. Taft, his late commission, and this bill have woefully departed, presenting, as a result of that departure, a proposition so twisted and warped that both the object to be achieved and its means of accomplishment seem to be ignored and forgotten.

It must be remembered that the idea of this legislation is that the burden of assuming the risk incident to the employment was to be transferred from the employee to the general public. As I have already stated, that is the basic principle upon which this legislation rests. No one recognizes that better than the distinguished gentlemen who propose this bill, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and my own colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], for in both of their bills as originally introduced there was a section providing that, in fixing both freight and passenger rates, the Interstate Commerce Commssion should make ample allowance to the railroads for the expense that would be put upon them by the passage of this legislation. This section they struck out of the bill in committee because of its utter inconsistency with another section, to wit, section 3, which makes the remedies proposed in this bill the sole and exclusive remedy of the workingman, and repeals in one sweeping stroke the splendid legislation that this Congress has spent years in perfecting, and which, after the most stubborn and protracted litigation, was only about a year ago completely upheld and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. (Mondou v. New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., 223 U. S., p. 1.)

The effect of this proposed radical and sweeping change would be most terrific and most unjust. In the first place, instead of transferring the burden of carrying the risk incident to the employment from the backs of all workingmen engaged in interstate railroad work to the general public, it would transfer that burden to the shoulders of an even smaller class than it now rests upon, namely, to the most careful and diligent of the workingmen, who have been injured under circumstances that entitle them to recover much larger sums from the railroads than any compensation they could ever receive under the pending bill. The remedy is worse, is more unjust than the evil it seeks to cure. A smaller class would bear the burden that humanitarian statesmanship would seek to place upon the general public than the class that bears it now under existing law. The doors of the court—the sacred right of the Anglo-Saxon to have a jury of the vicinage assess the amount of the damages against the man who has wronged him would be denied, and no matter how free from fault the servant or how negligent the master, the careful and prudent workingman who has been diligent and cautious, and who has been injured by the negligence of the master, would be told by this law that no matter what his actual financial loss was; no matter how much pain and suffering he had endured; no matter how badly he was disfigured; no matter how prudent, thoughtful, and cautious he had been in the performance of his duty; and no matter how gross the carelessness that had caused his injury, he could only make the railroad pay a mere pittance of what he would be entitled to recover under the law of master and servant in every civilized country on earth. And why? Because other men whose legal rights were not so great, whose financial loss was not so heavy, whose suffering was not so keen, whose prospects were not so bright, whose earning capacity was not so large ought, in the name of humanity and public policy, to have something, and, as neither the master, who is chafing under the liberalizing tendency of our statutes to broaden the rights of the workingman in the courts, nor the general public, in whose behalf the service is rendered and in whose name the propaganda proceeds, can afford to pay, therefore the careful, the diligent, the prudent must give up something and strike an average far below his legal rights so that all may receive something.

To my mind the proposition is indefensible. Indeed, it seems infamous to me. It is neither more nor less than shutting the courthouse door in the face of the man who wishes to insist upon his rights rather than take the beneficent charity that humanitarian policy provides. It puts a premium on carelessness. It offers no reward to diligence. Under this bill the charity of the law falls alike upon the just and the unjust; upon the diligent and the careless; upon the young man with a life of usefulness and of long and increasing earning capacity in front of him, and with a young and growing family dependent upon him; and, on the other hand, upon the old man, whose earning days are almost over, whose capacity to earn money is decreasing, whose family is grown up and no longer really dependent upon him. The man who ought, under the law, to be allowed to recover his full financial loss, and for his pain, his suffering, his disfigurement, must give up his rights because neither the railroad nor the public is willing to pay for the injury of the man who could not recover under the rules of law, but who ought, as a matter of public policy, to receive some compensation for injury. I do not object to these men who have no legal rights against the master being allowed compensation, and far more reasonable compensation than this bill provides, at that. On the contrary, I earnestly favor it. But if we do it as a matter of humanity, of sound public policy, and do it because the public in whose interest the service is performed ought to bear the risk incident to the service, then, in the name of heaven, why should not the railroads primarily and the public ultimately foot the bill? Why should it be shoved off on the careful, prudent, diligent workingman who has been injured through no fault of his own and because of the negligence of the master? Such an idea, to my mind, is both intolerable and indefensible, and I denounce it here and now as a scheme born of railroad desire to escape the full measure of liability under the employers' liability law.

So far as the attempt to stir up prejudice against the lawyers who represent the plaintiffs in these suits is concerned, I scorn it as unworthy of either serious consideration or extended reply. "Ambulance chasers" the railroad crowd delights to call them. If they are half as nimble in that chase as some of the railroad lawyers and agents, they certainly deserve the title; but in behalf of the bar of my own State, I wish to say that so far as we are concerned, as a general rule at least, the members of our legal profession are not deserving of the stigma some gentlemen who favor this bill attempt to attach to their names. As a general rule, the lawyers of my State who are not representing the railroads take this character of cases when they come to them in the regular and legitimate course of business, and I do not believe that because they do so they ought rightfully to be held up to the public as pettifogging marplots who seek to stir up litigation and endeavor to drum up business, or as vampires who drain the poor laboring men who are so unfortunate as to become their clients of the last drop of blood. Nowhere in the Union is the general tone of the bar higher, its devotion to lofty ideals of professional conduct more striking, and its unselfish service to the public more noteworthy than in the State of Georgia; and while I have the highest regard and respect for many of the lawyers who represent our railroads, yet I am quite confident that they have not furnished all of the intelligence, integrity, patriotism, and courage that have glorified the past history of the Georgia bar and that contribute so largely to the present prosperity and greatness of our State. At least a fair proportion of these notable contributions have come from the rank and file of the lawyers of our State who hold no retainers from the railroads and often take cases against them.

But why dwell on this phase of the "argument" advanced by the proponents of this bill? If the standard of the bar is not as high as it might be in any State, if the practices and charges of the lawyers who represent the plaintiffs in this character of cases is wrong in any State, then that State has ample and plenary power to right the wrongs and correct the abuses, so far as intrastate business is concerned. If the practices of these lawyers are wrong or their charges exorbitant as to cases arising in interstate commerce, then Congress has ample and complete power to apply whatever remedy is needed—to correct whatever abuses may exist—to even limit the amount of fees that may be charged. It seems to me that this is a complete answer to the profound and weighty "arguments" advanced against "ambulance chasers."

The proponents of this bill insist that if it becomes a law it will cost the railroads of the country a much larger sum than they now have to pay under our liability laws. Evidently the railroads do not think so, for their earnest support of this measure is overwhelming proof to the contrary—far stronger, to my mind, than any of the statistics they have produced. Besides, their so-called statistics, admittedly furnished by the railroad claim agents, are all taken before our Federal liability law of 1910 had gone into practical operation and while the enforcement of that law was being held up everywhere by the constitutional attacks that the railroads were making upon it, which did not finally fail until January 15, 1912, when the Supreme Court decided the Mondou case (223 U. S., p. 1). I venture the assertion that when impartial statistics are taken from the date of that decision and careful account is taken of the settlements that our liability law will force out of the railroads, a very different state of facts will be shown to exist, and the real reason why the railroads so earnestly desire the pending bill will then be known of all men.

Mr. Speaker, there is no English-speaking people on this earth, no spot in all the world where the spirit and substance of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence exists, where individual rights have been so wantonly ignored, the doors of the courthouse so rudely and unjustly closed upon the man who demands justice instead of mercy, as is proposed in this bill.

In the sheep's clothing of humanitarian philanthropy the railroad wolves are proposing to crucify justice between master and man, while they save their own skins and work a great "reform" at the expense of the diligent and cautious and prudent workingman, calling upon him to pay the bill which ought to be a charge upon the whole public. A real reform can be worked on this great question, a great humane policy can be inaugurated, and ought to be; but for one I enter my solemn protest against the attempt made by this bill to deny justice to a portion of our workingmen in order to confer largess upon others.

At no time, in no country, have people of our blood and race who have exalted individual rights and enthroned personal liberty as yet committed themselves to the monstrous doctrine that a servant ought to be denied full legal redress for whatever wrong his master inflicts upon him so that the master might be better able to make presents to all his servants. And yet that is the bald and unvarnished doctrine upon which this bill rests. Justice before generosity is as firmly embedded in Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence as it is in Holy Writ.

My friend from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] has given you the long list of English-speaking countries in which the principle of compensation to injured workmen, irrespective of diligence, has been adopted. It is a noteworthy fact that in every one of them the compensation provided was merely supplementary to existing liability laws and in no case superseded those liability laws. Is this a mere coincidence? Is it not more? Is it not the very spirit and essence of Anglo-Saxon justice throughout the world speaking to us to-night in solemn warning, "Be just before you are generous"?

In my judgment we ought to have a compensation law, but it should be given to the workingman in addition to what he already has and not in lieu of it, and he ought to have the option which he will take.

Able gentlemen who support this bill venture to assert that if we undertake to do that it will be both unjust to the employer and unconstitutional. How unjust to the employer? Is not the public and not the railroad the ultimate paymaster? Even now we all know that every railroad rate, interstate and intrastate, freight and passenger, is based in part on the operating expenses of the railroads, and that "operating expenses" include the damage claims the railroads pay. Who, then, pays the bill—the railroad or the public?

How unconstitutional? Have not the gentlemen who propose the bill submitted elaborate and, I think, unanswerable briefs to show that under the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court in the Mondou case—and their briefs go far back of that case—the power of Congress under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution is plenary for the complete regulation of all civil relations between the master and servant while engaged in such commerce? Have they not shown us that under that power the rights of the servant can be altered or abridged in any way that seems good to Congress? Have they not shown us, and do they not by pressing this bill assert, that the servant has no inviolable, no constitutional right to sue his master, and that the very doors of the courthouse may be closed in his face—as to the future, at least—by the bald statement that Congress has completely abolished by statute his right to recover from the master for wrongful injury?

Can these gentlemen be heard to contend that the rule will not work both ways; that the power is ample only when directed against the servant? Can they successfully contend that while under the commerce clause Congress may entirely abolish the right of the servant to recover of his master for wrongful injury, yet that the commerce clause does not confer on Congress the right to deprive the master of any or all defenses against the servant?

Does "due process of law" protect capital while impotent to protect labor? Is it all powerful when leveled upon the servant and absolutely powerless when it is leveled upon the master? It seems to me that a simple statement of this remarkable contention carries with it the answer.

We can enact this legislation and make it optional with the employee, and, in my judgment, that is what we ought to do and will do when we come to really pass legislation of this character.

Mr. Speaker, I will not now undertake to dissect this bill section by section and point out what I regard as its most glaring injustices, its most notable inequalities. I have endeavored so far to confine my argument to the great questions of principle that are involved—to the substantial denial of justice to many, to the twisted and warped application of a doctrine that we all favor, to the tremendous assault on the very principles of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence that are all involved in this most dangerous bill. At a later time, possibly in another Congress, I may endeavor to discuss the details of this bill, but for the present I am content to stand, as I think every other Democrat on this floor ought to be, with our President-elect, Gov. Woodrow Wilson.

On October 10, 1912, while the recent campaign was in progress, Mr. Wilson wrote a letter about this bill to Mr. W. L. Hall, of Chicago, Ill. It was his construction of the Democratic platform on this question, and as such is entitled to both consideration and weight, at least with members of his own party. It was published and widely circulated, and, in my opinion, exerted a potent influence in behalf of Mr. Wilson among the railroad workingmen. The letter is as follows:

> I am sorry I have not had an opportunity to study the pending workingmen's compensation bill, but I gave the whole matter very careful and extended consideration in connection with similar legislation in New Jersey. The New Jersey statute is not compulsory, but optional. It sets up a plan of compensation which has proved very satisfactory, and it also greatly simplified and facilitates recovery in cases where compensation is not adopted. I take the liberty of referring to the New Jersey statute as an embodiment of my views in this important matter. The only part of statute which seems to me to be open to difference of opinion is the scale of compensation, but that must always be a matter of adjustment to be altered according to the equities of the different classes of cases. As I see the matter now, it does not seem to me just that the existing rights of workingmen under the Federal law should in any way be curtailed.

Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen, I beg you note especially the concluding sentence of that letter, for therein lies the crux of this entire matter. Gov. Wilson said: "As I see the matter now, it does not seem to me that the existing rights of the workingmen under the Federal law should in any way be curtailed."

To that I agree most heartily, and therefore I am unalterably opposed to this bill, which not only proposes to curtail but to absolutely destroy every existing right of the workingmen under the Federal law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] has 17 minutes.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, the report of the Workmen's Compensation Commission was filed February 2 of last year and has been before the Members of this body for 13 months. The report of the Judiciary Committee on this bill was submitted on February 4. The proponents of the pending measure are in no degree responsible for the necessity that has come of passing it at this late hour of the session. I make profert of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], a member of the Judiciary Committee, who held this bill in the Judiciary Committee of the House from last May until February of this year.

I make profert of my friend the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules [Mr. HENRY] and of my distinguished colleague from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], a member of the Committee on Rules, who for two days have engaged in a filibuster here against the measure being considered, as a reason why we are not considering it under a rule with opportunity for full discussion and amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this is not a railroad bill. My friend from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] so described it, and yet in his minority report from the Judiciary Committee he asked the House to make this bill an optional bill, which is the one and only thing the committee of 21 railroad lawyers who appeared before the commission urged the commission to do. [Applause.]

The statement that the bill was framed by railroad claim agents is absolutely untrue. I helped draw every word of it as it came from the commission, and I never heard of a railroad claim agents' meeting until months after the bill had been completed and introduced in the House. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word about compensation. In one of the reports of the Labor Bureau the statement was made that in the industrial pursuits of this country the death toll runs from 25,000 to 30,000 per year and the injured to more than 2,000,000. On the railroads of this country, according to statistics, one employee is killed every 2 hours and 15 minutes and one is injured every 6 minutes. There are over 4,000 killed and over 100,000 injured during each year.

Mr. W. G. Lee, president of the railroad trainmen's organization for 17 years, informed the commission that of these thousands killed and injured the railroads paid damages in not more than 10 per cent of the cases. Mr. Samuel Gompers informed us, and informed the Judiciary Committee, that of the 10 per cent who recovered damages not more than 35 per cent of what the railroads paid went to their pockets, but the balance went to the damage-suit lawyers and to expenses of litigation. [Applause.]

It has been ascertained that in all industrial pursuits there is a large percentage of accidents that are inherent in the industry, for which fault can not be placed on anyone.

In Germany, where statistics have been carefully kept for more than 30 years, it has been shown that 44 per cent of the accidents that occur are due solely to the inherent risk of the industry for which no one can be held responsible.

In this country the statistics, so far as they have been gathered, show that the percentage of accidents due to the inherent risk of the industry run from 52 to 70 per cent. Under the negligence liability law the burden of this 40 or 50 or 70 per cent of the accidents is carried by the laboring man. The difference between compensation and negligence liability in the cases of railroads and others is this: In negligence liability the railroad carries the burden wherever you can prove negligence against the railroad. But where you can not prove negligence the laboring man carries the burden, and statistics show that in not 50 per cent of the accidents that occur can responsibility be fixed upon the railroad. Consequently for those the entire burden is carried by the laboring man. Likewise the burden is carried by him and by his dependents when he is at fault.

Compensation proceeds upon the theory that for every death or every accident there is an economic loss that must be borne by some one. It proceeds upon the theory of dependency, and upon the theory that a man killed as a result of negligence is just as dead as the man killed who has committed no negligence. It proceeds on the theory that the widow and children of the dead man are just as helpless and dependent when he was with fault as when he was without fault. It proceeds on the theory that it is human to err and that no man is strong enough, either mentally or physically, to be immune from mistakes. Compensation proposes instead of decreasing the rights of labor, instead of saying to railroad employees you can only recover in the few cases where you can prove negligence, you shall recover every time there is an accident. It abolishes the doctrine of negligence. It makes the fact of injury and not the fact of negligence the basis of recovery. It lifts from the back of labor a large part of the great burden of economic loss it now carries and places it upon the industry in whose service the loss was incurred.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRANTLEY. No; I decline to yield.

My friends in opposition here say they speak for labor. In answer to the appeal of my friend from Arkansas, my friend from Georgia, and my friend from Texas, who say they speak in the interests of labor, and in reply to them I give them the name of other friends of labor who appeared before the commission and indorsed this bill and who appeared before the Committee on the Judiciary and urged the passage of this bill. I give them the name of Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor.

I give them the name of Mr. Stone, grand chief of the Order of Locomotive Engineers; I give them the name of Mr. Garretson, chief of the Order of Railway Conductors; I give them the name of Mr. Lee, president of the Railroad Trainmen; and the name of Mr. H. E. Wills, the legislative representative of them all; and I ask you whether or not those men would be before the commission and the committee advocating a railroad bill. [Applause.] Mr. Gompers was quoted by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], but he read only a part of what Mr. Gompers said. Mr. Gompers said that he knew that a compensation law was not a thing that was sought by the employers of England nor by those of Germany nor by those of the United States. He further said:

If the railroad companies are agreed with me, I can not help it.

That is the answer that he made to the question of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. Speaker, a compensation law is a simple thing to understand. All in the world that it does is to say that as a substitute for negligence liability, where recovery is permitted only in a few cases, a recovery shall be permitted in every case of accidental death or injury.

It fixes that amount of recovery, and carries that amount to the widow in her hour of distress and when her need is greatest. It carries the money to the injured man when he is flat on his back, and not at the end of one or two or three years of litigation. [Applause.] And it carries all of it, and not a fourth or a third, as under negligence-liability laws. The Supreme Court of the State of Wisconsin, on November 14, 1911, in upholding the validity of a compensation law in that State, said:

Legislate as we may in the line of stringent requirements for safety devices or the abolition of employers' common-law defenses, the army of the injured will still increase and the price of our manufacturing greatness will still have to be paid in human blood and tears. To speak of the common-law personal-injury action as a remedy for this problem is to jest with serious subjects, to give a stone to one who asks for bread. The terrible economic waste and overwhelming temptation to the commission of perjury and the relatively small proportion of the sums recovered which comes to the injured parties in such actions condemn them as wholly inadequate to meet the difficulty.

Compensation is the remedy proposed for the condition described by the Wisconsin court. It is a remedy that every great civilized nation of the earth save the United States has adopted. Fourteen States of the Union have already adopted it and eight more have named commissions to prepare compensation measures for adoption.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] can not defend his position of opposition to this bill while declaring in favor of the principle of compensation, for this bill does the vital and all-important thing of establishing the principle of compensation. All else is but matter of detail that can be altered, changed, or modified hereafter as experience may show to be desirable.

Mr. Speaker, we made this law a compulsory law, and we made it an exclusive law. My friend from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] says that it ought to be optional. If it were made an optional law, you would allow each railroad of this country to say whether or not that railroad wanted to come under its operation. You would find under such a law that in those States where the railroad thought it more to its interest to come under the law the employee would refuse to come under it, and that in those States where the railroad refused to come under it the employee would want to come under it. The result would be that we would have a regulation of commerce enacted by Congress that no railroad in this country would observe. The theory of the commission was that the regulation proposed by this bill is a regulation of commerce, and that Congress can not delegate its power to regulate commerce to any railroad in this country, and that Congress must declare the rule to be observed and compel obedience to it. Therefore, we made the law compulsory. Otherwise it would not be a regulation of commerce by Congress.

We then made it exclusive. My friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] talks about the New Jersey law. I beg to inform him that that law is an exclusive law. Under its provisions when a man is injured he has but one remedy. He has the privilege, however, in advance of his injury to declare that if hurt he will not claim compensation, but will claim his right to sue. The employer likewise has the right in advance of the happening of an accident to one of his employees to say that he will not pay compensation.

The law is thus an optional law, but at the same time it is an exclusive law, for when an accident occurs but one remedy can be invoked. The New Jersey law was enacted under the police power of that State. This bill, if enacted into law, must be enacted under the power of the commerce clause of the Constitution. To be a valid exercise of that power it must declare a rule of conduct that shall be observed. To make a national compensation law optional in form would be the same thing as making the safety-appliance law, the boiler-inspection law, the hours of service law, optional in form. It would be to declare a legislative absurdity.

We have made this bill exclusive in form. This of necessity resulted from abolishing the law of negligence. I think there are but few in this advanced age of enlightenment and civilization who would have a compensation law otherwise than exclusive in form. To enact a law under which the railroad would be forced to pay unlimited damages in cases of negligence and fixed damages when free of fault would be the height of injustice. To give the injured employee after his injury the option to sue for damages or to claim compensation accordingly as he had a case for damages or not would be to accomplish no reform. It would be simply to create an injustice. It would preserve all the iniquities, the extravagant waste, and the strife-breeding qualities of negligence liability. There would never be an accident when the fact of negligence would not have to be ascertained. There would never be an accident without a contest between the damage-suit lawyer and the claim agent over the question of whether the injured man should sue for damages or accept compensation.

In addition to these considerations the commission was of the opinion that the law must be exclusive in order to be constitutional. A regulation of commerce in order to be valid must be reasonable, and a regulation giving the employee an election of remedies, giving him the right to sue for damages, or to claim compensation just as he preferred would not be a reasonable regulation. It would be but the arbitrary adding of an additional burden to existing burdens without any compensating advantage. Able lawyers appeared before the commission to urge that a compensation law would be violative of the due process clause of the Constitution. They said that to compel the railroad to pay where it had committed no fault, had been guilty of no negligence, had violated no duty, and had entered into no contract to pay would be the taking of its property without due process of law. Clearly this would be true if that was all compensation did, and equally clear it is that that is all compensation would do if the employee should be given an election of remedies.

The Supreme Court has held that the relations of master and servant engaged in interstate commerce are so related to such commerce as to be within the regulating power of Congress. This bill is but a regulation of these relations. It is a regulation reasonable in form, for as an offset against the arbitrary taking that it authorizes it relieves from unlimited damages and from suits to recover same. It observes the due process clause of the Constitution. It is a scheme of mutuality under which each party both gives and takes, and all for the benefit of each and of the public.

Some gentlemen who have not seriously studied the question while admitting that compensation is a good thing for the man who can not prove negligence, say that the benefits given to this man are given at the expense of the man who has a case for damages. But not so. Compensation is absolutely fair. It treats all alike. Unlike negligence liability, it makes no discriminations. This bill is for the man who has not been injured. If it becomes a law, it can not affect the man who at that time has been injured or who has a case for damages. Railroad employees are engaged in a hazardous occupation. They are liable to be injured or to be killed. They may be injured or killed in a way whereby damages can be obtained or in a way whereby they can not be claimed. No man can foresee in advance the manner in which he will be injured, and, therefore, in advance of any injury compensation says to all, treating all alike, that if anyone is injured, regardless of the question of negligence, he shall be compensated. There could be nothing fairer, nothing more humane, and nothing that ultimately can prove of more benefit to both employer and employee and to the public. The freedom from the irritation and friction of constant litigation between railroad and employee must mean better and more harmonious relations between them resulting in better and safer service of the public.

The penalizing of every accident must reduce the number of accidents. The elimination of any reason for obscuring the cause of accidents must make the ascertainment and removal of such cause easier of attainment. The unclogging of the dockets of the courts by striking therefrom personal-injury litigation will prove a boon to other litigants and to taxpayers.

There is but one class of our people that the passage of this bill will hurt, and that is the class of damage-suit lawyers and their retainers in and out of railroad service. The commission found that the railroads now pay something more than $10,000,000 per year for injuries to and deaths of their employees, and that of this enormous amount full $5,000,000 goes to waste in that it never reaches those for whose benefit it is paid. Lawyer fees and expenses of litigation consume it. No good citizen, it seems to me, can commend a system that in practice results in so much waste.

I want to remind my lawyer friends here and elsewhere that the practice of law is more than a trade. It is a glorious profession in which there is a high duty to government and society as well as to client and pocket. The fact that our Government is one of law and not of men explains why the lawyer has been given more honor and more prominence under it than under any other Government of the world. The lawyer of America has been true to high ideals throughout the past. He must be true to these ideals throughout the future if justice between man and man is to be preserved. He must ever strive for wiser and better laws and for the establishment of exact and equal justice if he would justify the confidence heretofore reposed in the priests of the law.

In my judgment, the lawyer can no more stand in the way of laws that eliminate strife, that destroy litigation, that make justice easier and quicker to be had, because strife and litigation and injustice mean fees to him, than the medical profession can stand in the way of health and sanitation laws because that profession thrives on disease and death. I commend this thought to my lawyer friends who oppose this bill.

[By unanimous consent, leave was granted to the following Members to extend their remarks in the RECORD: Mr. SABATH, Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. LANGLEY, Mr. RAKER, Mr. TAGGART, and Mr. HOWLAND.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill S. 5382, with the amendments as read:

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 218, nays 81, answered "present" 2, not voting 80, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded in the negative.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have a general pair with the gentleman from New Mexico, Mr. CURRY, and I would like to know if he has voted or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. CLARK of Florida was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, there are three typographical errors in the bill which I ask unanimous consent to correct.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to correct three typographical errors in the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. What are they?

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish to state them. On page 42, line 13, the word "of" was stricken out by the committee, but does not appear in the print, and on page 46——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will restate his correction.

Mr. CLAYTON. On page 42, line 13, the word "of" should be stricken out. The second amendment is on page 46, line 24, where the word "employer" should be "employee." The third one is——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of errors in this bill, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I withhold the objection for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] objects.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to state the other one.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will withhold my objection for a moment.

Mr. CLAYTON. On page 47, line 8, the word "employer" should be "employee." The context shows that these are typographical errors, without a doubt.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Reserving the right to object, I want to say that if this bill has been so carefully prepared that it can be put through in 40 minutes, I shall object to any correction.

Mr. SABATH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SABATH. Will it be in order to recommit with instructions?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The stage to recommit has passed.

Mr. CLAYTON. No particular harm is done. It can be corrected hereafter, if necessary. But I think the text shows they are typographical errors. The committee prepared it right, but it was the fault of the printer.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. For a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The Speaker never submitted the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] objected.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion which I send to the Clerk's desk, and I desire to inform the Members of the House that the amendment which is a part of the motion has been printed and can be obtained at the Doorkeeper's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the liberty of ordering the assistants of the Doorkeeper to distribute the amendment.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has not made the motion as yet. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURLESON moves to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee on Appropriations from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 28499) "making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government for the District of Columbia" and the amendments of the Senate thereto, and that the House disagree to all of the amendments of the Senate except the amendment numbered 132, that the House agree to the amendment of the Senate numbered 132 with an amendment as follows: "That the House ask for a conference and that the Speaker shall, upon the adoption of this motion, appoint the conferees without intervening motion."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

EXCISE.

SEC. 9. PARAGRAPH 1. That no person, company, copartnership, association, club, or corporation shall manufacture, sell, offer for sale, keep for sale, traffic in, barter, exchange for goods, give away, or otherwise furnish, in the District of Columbia, any intoxicating liquors, except as hereinafter provided. Wherever the term "intoxicating liquors" is used in this section it shall be deemed to include whisky, brandy, gin, wine, cordials, rum, ale, porter, beer, hard or fermented cider, and all other fermented, distilled, spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, and every mixture of liquors which shall contain more than 2 per cent, by weight, of alcohol, and any mixture of liquor which shall contain less than 2 per cent of alcohol, if the same shall be intoxicating.

PAR. 2. That there shall be, and is hereby, constituted an excise board for the District of Columbia, which shall be composed of three members, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall serve for a term of three years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified, except that the members first appointed shall serve for one, two, and three years, respectively, as may be designated by the President, or until their successors are appointed and qualified. The salary of said commissioners shall be at the rate of $2,400 per annum.

Hereafter no license shall be issued to a hotel having less than 50 bedrooms for guests, nor to any hotel the character of which, or the character of the proprietor or manager of which, is shown to be objectionable to said board.

Not more than three saloons or barrooms other than in hotels or clubs shall be permitted on one side of a street between intersecting streets, nor more than four on both sides of a street between intersecting streets.

No saloon, barroom, or other place where intoxicating liquor is sold at retail shall be licensed, allowed, or maintained within 300 feet of any alleyway occupied for residences or of places commonly called slums, except upon the unanimous vote of all three members of said excise board.

No saloon, barroom, or other place wherein intoxicating liquor is sold at retail or wholesale, other than hotels and clubs, shall be licensed, allowed, or maintained within 600 feet of any public schoolhouse, or a now located and established college, or university, or within 400 feet of any now established house of religious worship, measured between the nearest entrances to each by the shortest course of travel between such places of business and such public schoolhouse, college, or university, or established house of religious worship.

No license shall be granted to sell intoxicating liquors in the waiting room of any station or depot of any steam or electric railroad or other carrier for the transportation of passengers within the District of Columbia.

Hereafter no license shall be granted for the establishment or maintenance of a barroom or other place for the sale of intoxicating liquors, otherwise than in sealed packages and not to be drunk on the premises, in any residence portion of the District of Columbia; and it shall be the duty of the excise board to determine in the case of each application for license whether the location where the barroom is to be located is or is not within the business portion of the District, and if not the license shall be denied; and the excise board is hereby authorized and required to determine in each case what is so far devoted to business as to constitute it a business street or section: Provided, That no license shall be granted for any saloon or barroom on any side of any square, block, or tract of land where less than 50 per cent of the foot frontage, not including saloons or hotels and clubs having barroom licenses under this section, is used for business purposes; nor shall intoxicating liquors be sold at wholesale outside of the business districts as above provided.

No saloon, barroom, or wholesale liquor business shall be licensed, maintained, or allowed in the territory west of the following lines: The westerly line of the fire limits as now established from its southerly limits to where the same intersects with the mile limit of the Soldiers' Home; thence westerly and northerly along the said mile limit until the same intersects with Kansas Avenue; thence along Kansas Avenue to its intersection with the northern boundary of the District of Columbia.

Said board shall consider and act upon all applications for license to sell intoxicating liquors, and may require a report thereon by the chief of police, and the action of said board shall be final and conclusive. In the issuing of licenses for barrooms it shall be the duty of the excise board to adopt such a policy as will reduce the number of barrooms, including those in hotels and clubs, to not exceeding 300 by November 1, 1914, but no licensee who shall conduct his business within the law shall be deprived of his license or required to change his location before November 1, 1914. On the granting by said board of a license to sell intoxicating liquors, the assessor shall issue a license to the applicant. Said board shall make such rules and regulations for carrying into effect this section as it may deem requisite and proper. It shall make an annual report to Congress setting forth the number of applications for license, whether favorably or unfavorably acted upon, the number of persons convicted for violation of this statute, and the number and amount of fines collected and uncollected; and said excise board is hereby authorized and empowered to summon any person before it to give testimony, under oath or affirmation, as to any matter affecting the operation of the laws regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia; and any member of the board shall have the power to administer oaths or affirmations for all purposes of administering said laws. Such summons may be served by any member of the Metropolitan police force, and the refusal or neglect of a witness to appear before the said board or to testify when required may be punished in the same manner as a refusal to appear before the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as provided for in the acts of February 20, 1896, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' approved May 11, 1892," and July 1, 1902, entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes." Witnesses so summoned shall be entitled to a fee of $1.25 for each day's attendance before the said board, payable out of the contingent fund of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; and any witness knowingly making a false statement to the said board on any material matter shall be guilty of perjury and punishable accordingly.

PAR. 3. That the said board shall appoint a clerk at a salary of $1,500 per annum and an inspector with police powers at a salary of $1,500 per annum. Said inspector shall make inspections as may be required by this section, under the orders of the board, and make full report of such inspections to the board. He shall wear a badge indicating that he is such inspector of the excise board. The board shall keep a full record of all applications for license, of all recommendations for and remonstrances against the granting of licenses, and the actions taken thereon.

PAR. 4. That every person applying for a license to sell intoxicating liquors in said District shall file with the said board a petition for such license, and such petition shall be considered and acted upon by the board in the order in which such petition is filed and numbered. Said petition shall contain—

First. A statement giving the name and residence of the applicant and the time he has resided in the District of Columbia.

Second. A statement describing the particular place for which a license is desired, designating the same by street and number, if practicable, and if not, by such other apt description as will definitely locate it, and how long said applicant has been engaged in business at said place.

Third. The full name and residence of the owner of the premises upon which the business is to be carried on.

Fourth. A statement that the applicant is a citizen of the United States and a bona fide resident of the District of Columbia, and not less than 21 years of age, and whether such applicant has, since March 3, 1893, been adjudged guilty of violating the laws governing the sale of intoxicating liquors or for the prevention of gambling in the District of Columbia.

Fifth. A statement that he intends to, and if licensed will, carry on such business for himself and not as the agent of any other person, company, copartnership, or corporation.

Sixth. A statement that he intends to superintend in person the management of the business for which he asks a license, and that if licensed he will so superintend the management of the business so licensed.

Said petition must be sworn to by the petitioner before a notary public or other person duly authorized to administer oaths and affirmations. If any false material statement is knowingly made in any part of said petition, the petitioner making said affidavit shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof shall be subject to the penalty now provided by law for that offense; and in case a license has been issued to said petitioner the same shall be immediately revoked by said board. Notice of the filing of said petition shall be given by the applicant in such manner as may be prescribed by general rules and regulations adopted by the excise board; and if protests against the granting of such license are filed no final action shall be taken by the excise board until the protestants shall have had an opportunity to be heard, under rules and regulations prescribed by said board.

PAR. 5. That the licenses authorized and provided for by this section shall be of two classes, wholesale liquor licenses and barroom licenses. The fee for a wholesale liquor license until November 1, 1914, shall be $500 per annum, and for a barroom license $1,000 per annum until November 1, 1914; and thereafter the fee for a wholesale liquor license shall be $800, and the fee for a barroom license shall be $1,500 per annum. Every applicant for a liquor license shall deposit the amount of the license fee with the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia at the time of filing the application with the excise board. If, upon consideration of the application for license by the board as provided for in this section, the board shall decide to grant the license prayed for it shall notify the assessor, and the applicant shall thereupon receive his license; and only on the granting by said board of a license to any applicant to sell intoxicating liquor shall the assessor issue a license to such applicant. Whenever a license shall be refused by said board, the collector of taxes shall forthwith refund the deposit aforesaid. A barroom license shall be required for every hotel, tavern, barroom, club, or other place in which intoxicating liquors are sold or dispensed at retail. A wholesale liquor license shall authorize the licensee to sell intoxicating liquors in sealed packages only and in quantities not less than 1 quart in the aggregate, except in sealed original or bonded package in quantity not less than approximately a pint, and not to be drunk on the premises where sold; and no wholesale license shall be granted until it is satisfactorily shown that the place where it is intended to carry on such business is properly arranged for selling such liquors as merchandise. Every place where intoxicating liquors are sold to be drunk on the premises or in quantities less than one quart, except in sealed original or bonded packages as aforesaid whether drunk on the premises or not, shall be regarded as a barroom; and the possession of intoxicating liquors, with the means and appliances for carrying on the business of dispensing the same to be drunk where sold, shall be prima facie evidence of a barroom within the meaning of this section, and the license therefor shall be known as a barroom license. All makers, brewers, and distillers of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia shall be required to take out the wholesale license provided for in this section: Provided, That when such business is carried on at more than one place a license shall be required for each place. Before the excise board may grant a license to a club it must be satisfactorily shown that such club is duly incorporated; that its membership is bona fide, all being on an equal status with equal privileges and responsibilities; that its purposes are legitimate; and that the sale of liquor intended is no more than an incident, and is not a prime source of revenue. A license to a club may be issued in the name of its president, and in case of violation of the provisions of this section in such club, he and the secretary, the treasurer, and the manager of the club shall be proceeded against collectively or severally in their individual capacities and, if convicted, be subject to the penalties prescribed in paragraph 14 of this section, and the license of said club shall be immediately revoked by the excise board: Provided further, That after November 1, 1914, there shall not be granted licenses to more than 25 clubs, including those now licensed.

PAR. 6. That under the license issued in accordance with this section no intoxicating liquors shall be sold, given away, or in any way disposed of to any minor, intoxicated person, or habitual drunkard, and ignorance of the age of any such minor shall not be a defense to any action instituted under this section; and no licensee under this section shall sell, give away, or dispense any intoxicating liquors to any person between the hours of midnight and 7 o'clock in the morning, nor on Sundays or Inauguration Day, and between said hours, and on Sundays and Inauguration Day every barroom and other place where intoxicating liquors are sold shall be kept closed; that no minor under the age of 18 years shall be allowed to enter or be permitted to remain in any place where intoxicating liquors are sold, other than a hotel or club; that the interior of every barroom shall at all times when selling is prohibited be exposed to full view from the street, without obstruction by screens, blinds, curtains, stained glass, bottles, boxes, signs, or other material, except in the case of clubs licensed under this section and hotels having only an interior barroom, which shall be exposed to full view from the corridors or passageways leading to the entrance or entrances to such barroom.

PAR. 7. That any minor who falsely represents his age for the purpose of procuring intoxicating liquors shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined for each offense not more than $50, and in default in the payment of such fine shall be imprisoned in the reformatory or workhouse of said District not exceeding 30 days.

PAR. 8. That no license under this section shall be issued for a longer period than one year, and the year shall begin on the first day of November and end on the last day of October following; and no license shall be transferred by the licensee to any other person or to any other place, except with the written consent of the excise board upon a regular application therefor in writing and after notice and hearing as in this section provided upon an original application for a license; and the fee to be paid by the party applying for such transfer shall be $2, which shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District before such transfer is made: Provided, That the excise board shall not allow the transfer of the license of any person against whom there are pending in the courts or before the excise board charges of keeping a disorderly house or violating the excise laws or the laws against gambling in the District of Columbia.

PAR. 9. That every person receiving a license to sell liquor under this section shall frame the same under glass and place it in a conspicuous place in his place of business, so that anyone entering such place may easily read such license.

PAR. 10. That all applicants for license and persons holding licenses under this section shall allow any member of the excise board or the duly authorized inspector of the said board full opportunity and every facility to examine, at any time during business hours, the premises where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, or for which a license is asked or has been granted; and the same opportunity and facility shall be afforded, by the licensee or some person acting in his stead, any member of the Metropolitan police force, who has reasonable belief that the law is being violated, to enter and examine at all times such licensed places, and no person or persons shall obstruct, hinder, or in any manner molest such inspector or officer, provided such inspector or officer exhibits a badge showing he is such inspector or officer.

PAR. 11. That regularly licensed druggists or pharmacists shall not be required to obtain license under the provisions of this section, but they shall not sell intoxicating liquors, nor compound, nor mix any composition thereof, nor sell any malt extract, or other proprietary medicines containing more than 2 per cent of alcohol, except such compounds, compositions, malt extracts, or proprietary medicines be so medicated as to be medicinal preparations or compounds unfit for use as beverages, except upon a written and bona fide prescription of a duly licensed and regularly practicing physician in the District of Columbia, whose name shall be signed thereto. Such prescription shall contain a statement that the disease of the patient required such a prescription, shall be numbered in the order of receiving, and shall be canceled by writing on it the word "canceled" and the date on which it was presented and filled, and kept on file in consecutive order, subject to public inspection at all times during business hours. No such prescription shall be filled more than once. Every druggist or pharmacist selling intoxicating liquors as herein provided shall keep a book provided for the purpose, and shall enter therein at the time of every sale a true record of the date of the sale, the name of the purchaser, who shall sign his name in said book as a part of the entry, his residence (giving the street and house number, if there be such), the kind and quantity and price of such liquor, the purpose for which it was sold, and the name of the physician giving the prescription therefor. Such book shall be open to public inspection during business hours, and shall be in form substantially as follows:

Date.	Name of purchaser.	Residence.	Kind and quantity.	Purpose of use.	Price.	Name of physician.	Signature of purchaser.

Said book shall be produced before the excise board or the courts when required: Provided, That pure grain alcohol may be sold without a physician's prescription for mechanical, medicinal, and scientific purposes by registered druggists or pharmacists, who shall keep a book for the purpose of registering such sales in a similar manner or form as required for the sale of intoxicating liquors as provided in this section: Provided further, That any person who shall make any false statement as to the purpose or use of alcohol purchased under the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined for each offense not more than $50, and in default of the payment of such fine shall be imprisoned in the workhouse of said District not exceeding 30 days.

Any druggist or pharmacist who shall sell or dispense any intoxicating liquors, except in such manner as provided in this section, or who shall fail or refuse to keep the record herein required, or who shall refill any prescription, or who shall violate any other provisions of this paragraph, shall be guilty of illegal selling, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to the penalties prescribed in paragraph 12 of this section. Upon a second conviction for said offense, in addition to the penalties prescribed in said paragraph 12, it shall be a part of the judgment of conviction that the license of such druggist or pharmacist to practice pharmacy shall be revoked, and the court before which such person is tried and convicted shall cause a certified copy of such judgment of conviction to be certified to the board having authority to issue licenses to practice pharmacy in the District of Columbia.

Any physician who shall prescribe any intoxicating liquor except for treatment of disease which, after his own personal diagnosis, he shall deem to require such treatment, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $200, and in default of payment of said fine shall be imprisoned in the District Jail or workhouse for not less than 30 nor more than 90 days, and upon a second conviction for said offense, in addition to the penalty above provided, it shall be a part of the judgment of conviction that the license of such physician to practice medicine be revoked, and the court before which such physician is tried and convicted shall cause a certified copy of such judgment of conviction to be certified to the board having authority to issue licenses to practice medicine in the District of Columbia.

PAR. 12. That any person, company, copartnership, corporation, club, or association manufacturing, selling, offering for sale, keeping for sale, trafficking in, bartering, exchanging for goods, or otherwise furnishing any intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, without first having obtained a license as herein provided, or shall manufacture, sell, offer for sale, keep for sale, traffic in, barter, exchange for goods, or give away intoxicating liquors in any part, section, or district of the District of Columbia wherein the same is prohibited by law, upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $250 nor more than $800, and in default in the payment of such fine be imprisoned in the District jail or workhouse for not less than two months nor more than six months; and upon every subsequent conviction for such offense shall, in addition to the penalty named, to wit, a fine of not less than $250 nor more than $800, be imprisoned in the workhouse of the District of Columbia not less than three months nor more than one year.

PAR. 13. That any person, company, copartnership, corporation, or club having obtained a license under this section, who shall violate any of its provisions shall, upon conviction of such violation, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, and the excise board may, in its discretion, revoke the license; and upon a second conviction of such violation such licensee shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $500, and in addition to such fine the excise board shall immediately revoke the license. That upon the conviction of any licensee of keeping a disorderly or disreputable place, it shall be the duty of the excise board to immediately revoke the license of such convicted licensee, and after such revocation no license shall again be granted to him for said place or elsewhere, nor shall a license be granted to anyone else for said place for a period of three years from the date of said revocation of license.

PAR. 15. That all applicants who have had a license during the preceding year who so desire shall apply for a renewal of such license on or before the first day of September of each license year: Provided, That in the event of the death of a person having a license under this section during a license year there shall be refunded to the personal representative of the deceased such amount of the license fee in proportion to the unexpired part of the license year: Provided further, That the minimum portion of said license fee to be retained for any portion of the license year, irrespective of its proportion to the entire year, shall be $200 in the case of barroom licenses and $100 in the case of wholesale licenses: Provided further, That the personal representative of any deceased licensee may within 30 days after the death of such licensee transfer said license in accordance with the provisions of this law, touching transfers of licenses.

PAR. 16. That no license, either wholesale or barroom, shall be issued to any person or for any place located within 1,000 feet of the grounds of the marine barracks, the War College, and engineer barracks, or of the navy yard, in the District of Columbia.

PAR. 17. That any person assisting in or aiding and abetting the violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $100 or be imprisoned in the District jail or workhouse for not more than three months for each and every offense: Provided, That no witness shall be excused from testifying in any case brought under this section on the ground that his answers may tend to incriminate him in connection with any violation of this section, and such witness so testifying shall not thereafter be prosecuted for violation of any provision of this section concerning which such witness may have testified.

PAR. 18. That prosecutions for violations of the provisions of this section shall be on information filed in the police court by the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants duly authorized to act for him, and said corporation counsel or his assistants shall file such information upon the presentation to him or his assistants of sworn information that the law has been violated; and such corporation counsel and his assistants shall have power to administer oaths to such informant or informants, and such others as present themselves, and anyone making a false oath to any material fact shall be deemed guilty of perjury and subject to the same penalties as now provided by law for such offense.

PAR. 19. That if one or more persons who are competent witnesses shall charge on oath or affirmation before the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants duly authorized to act for him, representing that any person, company, copartnership, association, club, or corporation has or have violated or is violating the provisions of this section, by manufacturing, selling, offering for sale, keeping for sale, trafficking in, bartering, exchanging for goods, giving away, or otherwise furnishing intoxicating liquor without license, and shall request said corporation counsel or any of his assistants duly authorized to act for him, to issue a warrant, said attorney or any of his assistants shall issue such warrant in which warrant the room, house, building, or other place in which the violation is alleged to have occurred or is occurring shall be specifically described, and said warrant shall be placed in the hands of the captain or acting captain of the police precinct in which the room, house, building, or other place above referred to is located, commanding him at once to thoroughly search said described room, house, building, or other place and the appurtenances thereof, and if any such shall be found, to take into his possession and safely keep, to be produced as evidence when required, all intoxicating liquors (if the same shall be found in quantities and in condition to suggest that it is kept for sale), and all the means of dispensing same, also all the paraphernalia or part of the paraphernalia of a barroom or other intoxicating-liquor establishment, and any United States internal-revenue tax receipt or certificate for the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquor effective for the period of time covering the alleged offense, and forthwith report all the facts to the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, and such intoxicating liquor or the means for dispensing same, or the paraphernalia of a barroom or other intoxicating-liquor establishment, or any United States internal-revenue tax receipt or certificate for the sale of intoxicating liquor effective as aforesaid, shall be prima facie evidence of the violation of the provisions of paragraph 1 of this section as charged or presented. If the accused shall be found guilty, the intoxicating liquor so seized shall, after the trial and time for writ of error, if no writ of error is taken, be destroyed by the police department; if the accused be found not guilty, the whole shall be held as his, its, or their property, or the property of the real owner.

PAR. 20. That it shall not be necessary in order to convict any person, company, association, club, or corporation, his, its, or their agents, officers, clerks, or servants, of manufacturing or selling intoxicating liquors without license, or in any section of the District of Columbia where the manufacture and sale is prohibited, to prove the actual sale, delivery of, or payment for any intoxicating liquors, but the evidence of having or keeping them in hand and offering to sell or barter, exchanging for goods or merchandise, shall be sufficient to convict; nor shall it be necessary in a warrant or in information to specify the particular kind of liquor manufactured, sold, offered for sale, kept for sale, trafficked in, bartered, or exchanged for goods or merchandise, but it shall be sufficient to allege in the warrant or information that the accused manufactured, sold, offered for sale, kept for sale, trafficked in, bartered or exchanged for goods or merchandise, or kept it deposited to sell or barter.

PAR. 21. That every person who shall, within the District of Columbia, directly or indirectly, keep or maintain, by himself or by associating or combining with others, or who shall in any manner aid, abet, or assist in keeping or maintaining any clubroom or other place in which any intoxicating liquors, the sale of which without a license is prohibited by this section, is received or kept for the purpose of use, sale, barter, giving away, or otherwise furnishing, or for distribution or division among the members of any club or association by any means whatever, without first having a license so to do, or in sections of the District wherein the sale of intoxicating liquor is prohibited, and every person who shall use, sell, barter, give away, or otherwise furnish, distribute, or divide any such liquors so received or kept shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to the penalties prescribed in paragraph 12 of this section.

PAR. 22. That any person who shall, in the District of Columbia, in any street or alley, in any public place, or in or upon any street car, or in or upon any other vehicle commonly used for the transportation of passengers, or in or about any depot, platform, or waiting station, drink any intoxicating liquor of any kind, or if any person shall be drunk or intoxicated in any street, alley, or public or private road or in any passenger coach, street car, or any public place or building, or at any public gathering, or if any person shall be drunk or intoxicated and shall disturb the peace of any person, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100, or by imprisonment for not less than 5 days nor more than 30 days in the workhouse or jail of the District of Columbia, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

PAR. 23. That the issuance of an internal-revenue special-tax receipt or certificate by the United States to any person as a wholesale or retail dealer in distilled liquors or in malt liquors at any place within the District of Columbia shall be prima facie evidence of the sale of intoxicating liquors by such person at such place, or at any other place of business of such person in the District where such special-tax receipt is posted and at the time charged in any prosecution under this section, but such time must be within the life of such receipt or certificate.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to modify the motion in one particular. There is a typographical error on page 4, line 3. I want the word "six" stricken out at the end of line 3 and the word "four" inserted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks to modify a word in line 3, page 4.

Mr. BURLESON. To strike out the word "six" and insert the word "four."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the modification will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] in a moment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BURLESON. I will.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to line 9, on page 29, and see if he does not intend that to be "act" instead of "section"—"That this section shall be in full force and effect," and so forth?

Mr. BURLESON. No.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It means section of the bill.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will wait until the Chair can put the motion, the Chair will recognize him to demand a second. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] moves to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee on Appropriations from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia, and the amendments of the Senate thereto, and that the House disagree to all of the amendments of the Senate except the amendment No. 132; that the House agree to the amendment No. 132 with an amendment; that the House ask for a conference, and that the Speaker shall, on the adoption of this motion, appoint the conferees without an intervening motion. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BURLESON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] to couple with his request a suggestion that some language be amended.

Mr. BURLESON. I modified my motion to that extent.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman, in this connection, if he will not further modify his motion by striking out the words "waiting room," on line 12 of page 4?

Mr. BURLESON. I would be very glad to do that, but I am afraid that there will be innumerable objections if I do.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Would this law prohibit the sale of whisky in the Union Station?

Mr. BURLESON. This amendment prohibits it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It does not; I beg the gentleman's pardon. The waiting room is not the whole station. It is not so now, and it will not be so after this law passes. The language is "waiting room."

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, if it is the purpose to permit the sale of whisky in the station, why not say so?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] 20 minutes.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, the members of the Appropriations Committee have put in a good deal of time over this measure, in order to work out a result which would satisfy reasonable men, whether they might belong to the wet, or dry persuasion. I think the proposed amendment is one that will stand any reasonable test to which it may be subjected. The Members of this body who believe in the Jones-Works bill will be astonished to find that this amendment has not departed in any material degree from the essential features of that measure. It preserves the strong regulative features of that bill, and at the same time has eliminated certain features of hardship of the same, provisions that would operate to do injustice, and mechanically force out certain reputable licensees now operating and doing business within the District of Columbia. As a result of the provisions that have been retained in this bill relating to the distances of saloons from established schools and churches, coupled with certain other provisions relating to the number of saloons that may be maintained upon the streets, the necessary effect of this bill will diminish the number of saloons in the city of Washington, without at the same time excluding the reputable people now engaged in that business, or leaving so inadequate a supply of saloons that those who are of a thirsty habit will not be able to quench their thirst within the city of Washington.

I would very much prefer, if possible, to use whatever time I have in answering questions that may be directed to the items of the proposed amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman give us his idea as to how many saloons will be put out of business?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It would be impossible to form any idea in that respect. The commissioners are clothed with large powers with respect to the establishment of saloons. In addition the bill provides that saloons can not be established within 400 feet of established churches, and public schools.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman understand that there are about 586 saloons in the District of Columbia now?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman think it is true, or approximately true, that the number will be diminished to 300?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think that is altogether likely.

Mr. BURLESON. The maximum number is actually fixed at 300.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Does the gentleman think the language of this proposed amendment would take the saloon out of the Union Station?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman kindly turn to the pages on which that provision appears? I call the gentleman's attention to page 4, line 12, to see if that is the language he refers to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Let me read:

No license shall be granted to sell intoxicating liquors in the waiting room of any station or depot of any steam or electric railroad or other carrier for the transportation of passengers within the District of Columbia.

Is it not the purpose to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks in the depot?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Why not strike out the words:

The waiting room of—

So that it will cover the entire depot?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that I would be perfectly willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Who is opposed to it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know that anybody is opposed to it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I think we are all in favor of it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Permit me to conclude my sentence.

Mr. BURLESON. I yield to the gentleman two minutes in which to conclude.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not only will that language reasonably construed be sufficient to eliminate the sale of liquor from the depot, but later in the bill it is provided that it shall be unlawful to take a drink in or about the Union Station. Consider the two provisions in connection, and it will be apparent, that there will be no sale of liquor in the station of the Terminal Co.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I do not think it is clear at all. The trouble is, you will be prosecuting the wrong man all the time.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Speaking for myself I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman. But who will be willing to take out a license for that place when the goods that he will sell can not be drunk either in or about the Union Station?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. To strike out the words "the waiting room of."

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am agreeable to that amendment.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Is it in order now to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURLESON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, the bill as agreed upon by the Appropriations Committee I shall support, because it is the Jones-Works bill in all of its substantial, virile features. There are a few amendments which have been conceded, which in fairness and justice should have been conceded. The first is the prohibition of 150 feet between barrooms. Instead of that four barrooms are allowed between two blocks if they face each other, or three on one side and one on the other, or two on each side in two immediately opposite blocks.

Another is, we strike out the "private school," because we saw how easy it might be for the private school, by establishing one near a barroom, to put that barroom out of business. Congress ought to put barrooms out of business and not let it be done by indirection or by any means that might smack of unfairness.

Another, we required more than 50 per cent of the frontage of a block to determine what is a business block instead of 50 per cent of the buildings. We struck out the provision that the chief of police shall obstruct a license, because it might lead to graft or private revenge.

We extend the time for the reduction of the number of saloons to 300 to November, 1914. That gives the present barkeepers 18 months to sell out and close up business.

The next is that after November 1, 1914, there shall be no more than 25 clubs licensed under this bill. At the present time there are 17, and at no time can there be more than 25. We struck out "11 o'clock" as the closing hour and put in 12 o'clock, in fairness to those who sell whisky and to those who want to drink it. It was thought that they ought to have until 12 o'clock in which to drink it if they wished. We struck out paragraph 7, which we thought might result in a good deal of vexatious litigation and unjust harassment of the barkeepers who had furnished certain persons with whisky.

We struck out the provision which prohibits giving free food. Some Members of Congress said they liked the free-food feature and wanted onions and meat now and then, and we thought in deference to them we would strike that out, though I do not like the free-food practice in barrooms.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; although I have but a minute.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Who does the gentleman mean by "we"?

Mr. WEBB. I mean that a number of us got together with the Appropriations Committee this afternoon and went over the bill with the hope that we could reach a compromise on the amendments.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I just wanted to find out who was responsible for these late hours.

Mr. WEBB. I think those who want to drink whisky, when the sale is authorized by law, ought to have a reasonable time in which to do so and allow those who want a nightcap to take it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. They might go home and get their nightcap.

Mr. WEBB. The slums and alleys are taken care of in that no saloon shall be established within the slums or near alleys except upon the unanimous consent of the excise board. The bill as it stands protects minors and women, and it does not go into effect until July 1, 1913. With these amendments we think we have got as good a bill as it is possible to get under the present circumstances. I therefore hope you will all vote for the pending measure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, this bill is distinctly a rich man's bill, and in its operation will be a hardship on the middle and laboring classes of the city of Washington. In order to establish absolute justice and equality between all classes and to test the sincerity of the House, I propose to offer an amendment, if I can get unanimous consent, providing that the sale, possession, and use of intoxicating liquor in the District of Columbia shall be prohibited. [Applause.] That would be the honest way, instead of the roundabout and hypocritical way, to accomplish one and the same purpose. In other words, it will not make so very much difference whether my amendment is adopted or this bill is passed. The bill provides that there shall be no saloon within 400 feet of a church or schoolhouse. The effect of this provision will be to wipe out more than 200 retail stores and to deprive the same number of citizens and their families of their means of subsistence. It is nothing more or less than confiscation of property, and there is nothing contained in the bill providing for compensation of the losses.

Mr. Speaker, a few years ago, when the Government of Switzerland decided to prohibit the sale of absinthe, a commission was established for the purposes of ascertaining the losses and assessing the damages. That commission went to work and reported to the legislature the amount of the losses resulting from the prohibition of that drink, and every dollar thus ascertained was paid by the Government before prohibition went into effect. That, gentlemen, is the civilized way of doing that kind of business, while here we propose to unceremoniously confiscate property legally acquired. You prohibitionists may laugh, but to the 250 men who have their all invested in a little place of business, and who built up a legitimate trade under the laws of this country, such a loss, I assure you, is a very serious matter.

The distance fixed in this bill to be maintained between retail stores and schools really covers an area of 240,000 square feet in each case, and this practically means prohibition everywhere except in one or two of the business streets of the city. The result is that the business of dispensing beverages will be practically monopolized by the large hotels and the aristocratic clubs. As far as the plain people are concerned you might as well make the Capital City altogether dry, and in order to carry your real purpose to a logical conclusion I am offering the amendment above mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, I also find that the hotels and the clubs here can do what they please under this bill. They can keep their doors open and sell liquor all day and all night, and no police and no excise commissioner will disturb them. But the poor man, the laboring man, who has been in the shop and the factory all day, when he tries to secure for himself a glass of beer, will be compelled to travel 2 miles to reach the business section of the city in order to obtain it. You must remember that the saloon is the poor man's club, but instead of shaping your laws to make it respectable, you rob it of its redeeming features. Hotels and clubs are allowed, under this bill, to keep pool and billiard tables, their patrons can enjoy music or a game of cards, but all these things are expressly prohibited in the ordinary saloon. Why? Are hotel guests and club members better than the other people? Is this the new American theory? If I had my way, Mr. Speaker, I would make a saloon so respectable that no man need hesitate to take his wife and daughter into it. That is the way it is in Germany, why can not we do it? Are we not as capable of regulating and controlling the traffic as the Germans are? If not, why not? I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, we have never seriously attempted it.

Mr. Speaker, I also find that when a physician writes a prescription in which whisky is an ingredient, the prescription can be filled but once by the druggist. There is not a physician in the city of Washington or in the country who will not tell you that prescriptions are very frequently repeated, but under this bill it can not be done. The patient will have to pay for a second or a third prescription, and if he happens to be a poor man you can appreciate what a hardship this legislation entails on him. There are some other provisions in the section relating to drug stores which I commend to the careful perusal of Members.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Certainly.

Mr. ADAIR. Does not the gentleman think that the patient would get well sooner if he could get the prescription filled only once?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That may be the gentleman's idea. I leave this to his imagination.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to his colleague?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In a moment. Mr. Speaker, I also find in the section relating to clubs that 12 o'clock is the closing hour. We have in this city a Press Club, to which all the members of the press gallery belong. [Laughter.] It is well known that these gentlemen do not finish their business until about midnight, and then is the time when they need the accommodations of the club. [Laughter and applause.] The gentlemen who are applauding evidently know for what purpose. [Laughter.] A strict enforcement of this provision would of course cause a very great inconvenience to that club, and I do believe it would wipe it out of existence.

As to the suggestion made by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] about the Union Station, I will say that even if the whole city of Washington were placed under the ban of prohibition there should be left one place where liquid refreshments should be permitted to be sold, and that is Union Station. I would leave one barroom at the main station of the city, because there is where a traveler needs such accommodations most. That is where all of the strangers and the foreigners arrive, and if a foreigner arriving from England or France or Germany were told that in the Capital of the United States he could not obtain a glass of wine or beer with his meal he probably would not believe it possible, or if he did he would surely herald it abroad, and in a very short time we would be the laughingstock of the world.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, when is the gentleman going to yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the gentleman to say that he was going to ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment prohibiting the sale of liquor in this town?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes. I want to test your sincerity.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Well, there is no objection to it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. How does the gentleman know? Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my kind friend, the gentleman from Missouri, Dr. BARTHOLDT, for yielding me this time. Some people may think it strange that the doctor would yield me this time, for about four years ago, I believe it was, at the request of nearly all of the churches in this city and all of the temperance organizations, I introduced a prohibition bill. But, Mr. Speaker, I never dreamed at that time that Dr. BARTHOLDT, without request, wholly upon his own motion, would ever try to pass a prohibition bill for the District of Columbia or any other place. Verily, Mr. Speaker, the world does move. I thank him for his kindness, and I am sorry that there will be men here who are cruel enough to deprive him of the opportunity and the great pleasure of offering his amendment providing for absolute prohibition in this District.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentlemen connected with this measure—Mr. BURLESON, who has had the direct management on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, and Mr. WEBB and Mr. WILLIS and Mr. GARRETT, and many other gentlemen—ought to be congratulated on bringing about a happy solution of a difficult situation. We have obtained legislation that we ought to have, and I do not believe these gentlemen would agree to any joker legislation. Like my friend from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], I think if we want a prohibition bill passed that we should call it such. I believe this measure is regulation and reduction and restriction, and here on Sunday morning, at 25 minutes after 12 o'clock, following the speech of my distinguished and beloved friend, Dr. BARTHOLDT, I hope everybody will vote for this measure and end our trouble.

Mr. Speaker, something has been said in the press as to this legislation being opposed by labor organizations and leaders of such organizations. As shedding light on the attitude of such organizations, I beg to read the following letter I received a few days ago:

3924 EIGHTH STREET,
Petworth, D. C., February 27, 1913.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the full-page advertisement inserted in all the city papers of the 25th instant by the Mercantile (liquor dealers') Association of Washington, I desire to call your attention to the following paragraph in said advertisement:

"The Central Labor Union, representing 22,000 workingmen, passed a resolution against any change in the present laws."

The Central Labor Union is composed of five delegates from each of the trades-unions, large and small, of the District, and Columbia Typographical Union, No. 101, composed of about 1,750 men and 50 women, has only the same number of delegates in the central body as organizations having not one-tenth as many members.

There is no doubt that the Central Labor Union passed a resolution protesting against any change whatever in the present excise laws, but I most emphatically deny that said resolution represents the honest sentiments of a majority of the 22,000 members of the local unions, to whom that question has never been submitted for a referendum vote.

On March 17, 1912, at the first meeting of Columbia Typographical Union after the hearings on the Jones-Works bill before the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, the inclosed resolutions, repudiating the action of the Central Labor Union, were adopted with but two dissenting votes. The Machinists' Union, about 1,400 strong, and the Carpenters' Union, about as strong numerically, adopted similar resolutions.

I do not wish to be understood as saying that a majority of the members of the local trades-unions are in favor of prohibition in the District of Columbia or in favor of all the provisions of the Jones-Works bill as it passed the Senate, but I know that a considerable number of them are in favor of prohibiting the liquor traffic entirely, that a larger number of them are in favor of the Jones-Works bill, and I firmly believe that a large majority of them are in favor of much more stringent regulations than now exist for the control of the liquor traffic in the District.

Of this I am absolutely certain: That the trades-unionists of the District of Columbia do not intend that a whisky bottle and a beer keg shall be made the emblems of organized labor by the saloon-keepers of Washington, by the Central Labor Union, or by anybody else.

I take pleasure in referring you to statements made by prominent members of organized labor, as printed in the Senate hearings on the Jones-Works bill, pages 30–32, 211, and 388–392, as more nearly representing the true sentiments of the workingmen and women of Washington in regard to the alcoholic liquor traffic than the action taken by the Central Labor Union on this question in connection with the Jones-Works bill.

I have been a member in good standing of Columbia Typographical Union, No. 101, of this city, for more than 40 years, and have taken a very active and somewhat prominent part in movements for the good and welfare of the workingmen and women of the District of Columbia and of the United States. (See inclosed pamphlet which fully corroborates this statement.)

I was president of the Federation of Labor Unions of the District of Columbia for four years, and later was chairman of its committee on legislation for three years.

Among the measures advocated by that body and adopted by Congress while I served in it as a delegate are the following:

Bill to prohibit the importation of Chinese coolies.
Bill to prohibit the importation of European labor under contract.
Bill for the establishment of a labor bureau.
Bill for a mechanics' lien law for the District.
Bill to prohibit the employment of convicts in competition with free labor on public work.
Bill to make eight hours a legal day's work for mechanics and laborers employed by the Government.
Bill making the first Monday in September of each year a legal holiday to be known as Labor Day.
Free textbooks for all children in the public schools of the District.

In view of the fact that thousands of organized workingmen have been placed in a false position before the people of the District of Columbia and of the country by the Liquor Dealers Association, I respectfully request that the inclosed account of a mass meeting held in Toronto, Canada, under the auspices of the Presbyterian department of church and labor, in November, 1909, while the American Federation of Labor was in session in that city, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as an appendix to this letter.

Very respectfully, E. W. OYSTER.

Mr. SPEAKER, I read also the following extracts from the hearings before the Senate committee when considering the Jones-Works bill, bearing on the attitude of labor leaders on temperance legislation:

LABOR UNIONS AND LABOR LEADERS OPPOSE THE SALOON.

NEW YORK CITY, December 8, 1909.

The Very Rev. JAMES E CASSIDY, Fall River, Mass.

DEAR AND REVEREND SIR: I have read with great interest the report of the sermon delivered by you on the subject "The saloon against the labor union." I have no hesitation in saying that you have correctly interpreted the relative positions of the saloon and the labor unions, and to all you have said on the subject I subscribe most heartily.

In various ways and on many occasions the evil influence of the saloon has been recognized and pointed out by the labor unions of the United States. While the liquor interests have sought to convey the impression that there was some common interest between trades-unionism and the manufacture and sale of intoxicants, this suggestion is repelled on every occasion when the matter is presented to the labor men in its true light and when the malign purpose of the liquor interests is exposed to view.

I have no sympathy with the statement, so often made, that the manufacture and sale of liquor has contributed to the industrial development of the Nation. On the contrary, I believe that liquor has contributed more to the moral, intellectual, and material deterioration of the people and has brought more misery to defenseless women and children than has any other agency in the history of mankind.

I wish to congratulate you for the magnificent presentation you have made of this question, and I thank you for your defense and advocacy of the true principles of trade-unionism.

I am, with respect,

Yours, very truly, JOHN MITCHELL.

LABOR NO ALLY OF THE SALOON, SAYS MORRISON—BARROOMS FORCED INTO WAGE-EARNERS' QUARTERS.

The impression that the saloon and the labor element are in close alliance is erroneous and largely caused by the attitude of the wealthy toward the saloon was an argument advanced yesterday by Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, who addressed a large audience at the Young Men's Christian Association men's meeting on "Labor's interpretation."

FORCE SALOON ON WORKERS.

"In great cities like New York, Chicago, and Pittsburgh, where people of great wealth reside," said Mr. Morrison, "they do not permit the saloon among their residences, but force it back into the quarters where the wage earners live, thus creating the impression that the laboring man and the saloon keeper are working hand in hand.

"Nothing is further from the truth," exclaimed Mr. Morrison, "for there never was a more powerful and effective medium to fight intemperance than organized labor, whose effort it is to secure for its members and their children a decent wage and workday."

In closing, the speaker said:

"Organized labor has done much for the cause of temperance among workingmen. There probably is no purely philanthropic organization which has done more in this direction. In many instances there is a prohibition clause in the contract with the employer. The rules of the union declare that an injured man will not receive the weekly sick benefit if the injury was suffered while he was intoxicated. More and more labor-union meetings are being held in halls which are free from saloons."

Mr. BURLESON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, there is no subject that comes before a legislative body concerning which it is as difficult to get calm and unprejudiced judgment as that relating to the regulation or sale of intoxicating liquors. This bill came to the Committee on Appropriations by virtue of having been tacked on an appropriation bill, and it ought not to have been on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is right.

Mr. SHERLEY. It ought to have come here in such form as to enable the House to consider it in detail, but it did not. I for one was unwilling that that great committee should rest under any sort of suspicion of trying to prevent action upon this subject and with my colleagues on the committee labored five hours going over this bill section by section in order that we might report something for the action of this House. The bill is a much more drastic bill than I as an individual drawing an original bill would have drawn, but it is, in my judgment, a vast improvement in its equities over the bill that it supersedes. It gives 18 months to men now in the saloon business to accommodate themselves to the new conditions. It does regulate by eventually reducing the number of saloons to 300, and included in that number are the clubs, which are limited to 25; and in answer to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] I desire to say that there is not a single privilege given to a club that is not given to a saloon, and there ought not to be. [Applause.] I believe that the poor man is entitled to just as many rights in the saloon as the rich man is in the club, and I for one have seen to it that this bill applies in its closing hours in its restrictions to the clubs the same as it does to the saloons. The hour of closing has been changed from 11 to midnight because in my judgment midnight is a very much more reasonable hour for a great metropolitan city than 11 o'clock. Midnight here is no later than 10 o'clock in many cities of smaller size.

There was also a change made in the distance from schools and from churches. The original provision might have permitted an unfair advantage being taken under the law by the establishment of nominal places of worship or private schools for the purpose of interfering with saloons. In other words, while we have undertaken to restrict within proper bounds the traffic in alcoholic liquors, we have undertaken to strip the bill of all its hypocrisy and cant by dealing in the open and on the level with the public and with the licensed saloon keeper. [Applause.] I believe when you act on these matters you should act in candor. Men differ as to whether there should be sale of alcoholic liquor or not. Men differ as to the number of saloons there should be, but no honest man ought to differ as to the desirability of making the law plain, so it can not be evaded either by the licensee or by those who are undertaking to deprive him of the rights which the law presumably has given him, and the labor of the committee was expended to accomplish that end. That the law will meet with the entire approval of every extreme prohibitionist or extreme liquor man I do not for a moment believe. I have had protests brought to me by the dozen from both classes here within the last few hours, when it was known this matter was to come up, but I think that the Congress or the United States is big enough and intelligent enough to determine what ought to be done touching the sale of liquor in the Capital of the Nation without receiving the volunteer advice of either the extreme prohibitionist or the extreme saloon man. Of them we may well say, with Mecutio, "A plague on both your houses."

Mr. Speaker, as representing what I believe to be the intelligent judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, which endeavored to deal conscientiously in the short time given it with an intricate subject, I ask of this House its approval of this measure. [Applause.] [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has two minutes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Only two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Only two, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has two.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer this amendment——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and that ends it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want the amendment read, if you please.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman objects.

Mr. MANN. Can not he have it read in his own time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have it read in his own time, if he wants it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want it read in my time. That is my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman sent it up here for amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The sale, possession, and use of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia is hereby prohibited.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, just one minute. The Committee on Appropriations has endeavored to make the Jones-Works excise bill mean just what it pretended on its face. By the substitute amendment we limit the number of saloons to 300, and at the same time make it possible to establish 300 saloons within certain prescribed limits in the District of Columbia. The substitute strips the Jones-Works excise bill of all its evasive, misleading, and unreasonable provisions and makes it impossible for those who might endeavor to prevent the establishment of the number of saloons the bill pretends to allow being conducted within the District.

The amendment embodied in the motion that I offered yesterday in some particulars was much more drastic than the amendment now offered that you are going to vote on. It contained every essential provision of a sane, regulatory character that is embodied in the pending amendment. In some particulars I think it would prove much more beneficial to the people of the District than the Jones-Works excise bill. It provided that a saloon could not be established less than 500 feet from a school, while under this amendment 400 feet is fixed as the limit; under the amendment I offered yesterday a saloon could not be located within 600 feet of a church; under this the distance is fixed at 400 feet. There is this essential difference between this amendment and the Jones-Works excise bill: This amendment as we now offer it can be easily understood. It is not a deception, a delusion, and a snare. It is not hypocritical. It is not a prohibition bill in disguise. I am gratified that the extreme prohibition element upon this floor have accepted this amendment in the spirit in which it is offered. I will not say it is satisfactory to me, but it is better than existing conditions; it is infinitely better than the Jones-Works bill, and I believe that it will prove a wholesome measure for the District. In order to get the bill to conference, I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, on page 22, line 8, to insert the word "restaurants" after the word "hotels." It was left out by mistake. It corresponds with what has gone before.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 8, after the word "hotels" insert the word "restaurants."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent to modify his motion in the manner reported by the Clerk. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] moves to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee on Appropriations from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia, and the amendments of the Senate thereto, and that the House disagree to all the amendments of the Senate except amendment No. 132, and that the House agree to the amendment of the Senate No. 132 with an amendment; that the House ask for a conference, and that the Speaker shall, upon the adoption of this motion, appoint the conferees without intervening motion. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. BURLESON, Mr. SAUNDERS, and Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio.

EXTENSION OF NEW HAMPSHIRE AVENUE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take up the bill S. 2504 and pass the same. It is a bill relating to the extension of New Hampshire Avenue.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2504. An act to provide for the extension of New Hampshire Avenue, in the District of Columbia, on a straight line, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no demand for a second. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2504) to provide for the extension of New Hampshire Avenue, in the District of Columbia, on a straight line, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That within six months after the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of New Hampshire Avenue on a straight extension of the lines thereof as now established in the city of Washington from its present terminus north of Buchanan Street to the District line, with a uniform width of 120 feet: Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages, for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said extension, plus the costs and expenses of said proceeding, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits: And provided further, That nothing in said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said code shall be construed to authorize the jury to assess less than the aggregate amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land to be condemned and the costs and expenses of the proceedings hereunder.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to change the plans for a permanent system of highways outside the city of Washington so as to abandon the extension of New Hampshire Avenue from Buchanan Street northward to the District line, as at present laid down on said plans.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing Senate bill 2504.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will it be proper for me to inquire of the gentleman who has charge of this bill as to who is to bear the cost, and whether the property that is to be benefited is to pay part of the cost of this extension?

Mr. SCHACKLEFORD. It is to pay all of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I assure the gentleman that it is all right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 2504. An act to provide for the extension of New Hampshire Avenue, in the District of Columbia, on a straight line, and for other purposes; and

S. 8575. An act to authorize the town of Okanogan to construct and maintain a bridge across the Okanogan River.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5382) to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries, resulting in disability or death, to employees of common carriers by railroads engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 22526) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate No. 132 to the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate, disagrees to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the said bill, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BURLESON, Mr. SAUNDERS, and Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio managers at the conference on the part of the House.

SEAMEN IN AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. BURTON. I take it House bill 23673 comes before the Senate without any formal motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that the proposed substitute recommended by the Senate committee be read for the information of the Senate. Then I will proceed, after the reading, to explain the differences between the Senate substitute and the House bill and the differences between it and the existing law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator yield to me to have a message from the House laid before the Senate?

Mr. BURTON. If it is merely laying a message before the Senate, I do not object; but if any time is to be taken, I must object, because otherwise we will have no time for a sufficient consideration of this bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If it takes time, I will withdraw it, of course.

Mr. BURTON. I yield, then, for a moment, with the understanding that if any time is required——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask that the action of the House with reference to Senate bill 5382 be laid before the Senate.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS TO EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Has the Secretary read all the amendments?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. All these amendments are in the direction of increasing the compensation of the employees and liberalizing the bill in their interest.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CULBERSON. The point of order is that the presentation or consideration of the amendments from the House of Representatives is in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the unanimous-consent agreement again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2.30 p. m., March 2, 1913, the Senate will vote, without further debate, upon the motion to agree to the conference report upon H. R. 28180, the rivers and harbors bill; and further, that at not later than 8 o'clock p. m. on said day the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending and amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 23673, the seamen's bill, so called—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition; the time for debate to be divided equally between the proponents and opponents of the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the question is on the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair fails to find in the unanimous-consent agreement any time stated for——

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Chair——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Allow the Chair to give the matter a little consideration.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to make an observation, however, before the Chair decides the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may do so.

Mr. CULBERSON. My suggestion is that it is implied in the agreement that the whole of the time is to be occupied in debate, and that it shall be divided equally between the two parties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What was troubling the mind of the Chair was as to whether this is a continuing unanimous-consent agreement or not. The Chair thinks it is, and the Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the amendments of the House be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be printed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the bill be printed with the House amendments numbered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BRYAN. I wish to say, so that there will be no misunderstanding about it, that the bill will lead to considerable discussion, and for one I am unwilling to allow a bill of such importance to be passed without an opportunity to see what the amendments are.

Mr. BURTON. I renew my request that the Senate substitute be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the substitute reported by the Senate Committee on Commerce.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I made a motion to concur, and I rise now to a parliamentary inquiry. The inquiry is whether or not the motion which I made to concur in the House amendments will be pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will be pending, or it can be renewed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

SEAMEN IN AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 23673) to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the amendment of the committee.

The Secretary read the amendment reported from the Committee on Commerce, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4516. In case of desertion or casualty resulting in the loss of one or more of the seamen, the master must ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same or higher grade or rating with those whose places they fill, and report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, without incurring the penalty prescribed by the two preceding sections."

SEC. 2. In all merchant vessels of the United States the sailors shall, while at sea, be divided into at least two and the firemen into at least three watches, which shall be kept on duty successively for the performance of ordinary work incident to the sailing and management of the vessel; but this provision shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, all the sailors or all the firemen or the whole crew is needed for the maneuvering of the vessel or the performance of work necessary for the safety of the vessel or her cargo or for the saving of life and property aboard other vessels in jeopardy. While the vessel is in a safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sundays or the following-named legal holidays: New Year's Day, Washington's Birthday, Good Friday, the Fourth of July, Labor Day, Columbus Day, Thanksgiving, and Christmas, but this provision shall not prevent the doing of work necessary to the dispatch of a vessel on regular schedule or when ready to proceed on her voyage. At all other times while the vessel is in a safe harbor, nine hours, inclusive of the anchor watch, shall constitute a day's work. Whenever the master of any vessel shall fail to comply with this section, the seaman shall be entitled to discharge from such vessel and to receive the wages earned. But this section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels, yachts, vessels of less than 300 gross tons or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 24 hours: Provided, That no member of the crew shall be required to be on duty more than 12 hours out of any 24 hours, except in cases of emergency as hereinbefore provided. But this exemption shall in no way interfere with the authority of the proper officers of the Government to make such lawful regulations or orders as they may deem necessary to secure safety at sea and prevent excessive hours of labor.

SEC. 3. That section 4529 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4529. The master or owner of any vessel making coasting voyages shall pay to every seaman his wages within 2 days after the termination of the agreement under which he was shipped, or at the time such seaman is discharged, whichever first happens; and, in case of vessels making foreign voyages, within 24 hours after the cargo has been discharged, or within 4 days after the seaman has been discharged, whichever first happens; and in all cases the seaman shall be entitled to be paid at the time of his discharge, on account of wages, a sum equal to one-third part of the balance due him. Every master or owner who refuses or neglects to make payment in the manner hereinbefore mentioned without sufficient cause shall pay to the seaman a sum equal to 2 days' pay for each and every day during which payment is delayed beyond the respective periods, which sum shall be recoverable as wages in any claim made before the court; but this section shall not apply to masters or owners of any vessel the seamen of which are entitled to share in the profits of the cruise or voyage."

SEC. 4. That section 4530 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4530. Every seaman on a vessel of the United States which, prior to the completion of her voyage, shall enter any port for the purpose of loading or delivering cargo shall, upon demand made subsequent to entering such port, be entitled to receive from the master of the vessel to which he belongs, within 48 hours after demand therefor, one-half part of the wages which he shall have earned at said port, and all stipulations of contract to the contrary shall be null and void: Provided, That wages earned during the first 5 days of service shall not be due or subject to demand prior to the completion of the voyage or expiration of contract. When the voyage is ended, every seaman shall be entitled to the remainder of the wages which shall then be due to him as provided in section 4529 of the Revised Statutes. This section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts: Provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels owned in major part by American citizens, corporations, or holding companies when such vessels are in harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement."

SEC. 5. That the second paragraph of section 4552 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4552. Second. Such release, so signed and attested, shall operate as a mutual discharge and settlement of all demands for wages between the parties thereto, on account of wages, in respect of the past voyage or engagement: Provided, That any court having competent jurisdiction may, upon good cause shown, set aside such release and take such action as justice may require."

SEC. 6. That section 4559 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4559. Upon a complaint in writing, signed by the first and second officers or a majority of the crew of any vessel, while in a foreign port, that such vessel is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea because she is leaky or insufficiently supplied with sails, rigging, anchors, or any other equipment, or that the crew is insufficient to man her, or that her provisions, stores, and supplies are not or have not been during the voyage sufficient or wholesome, thereupon in any of these or like cases the consular or a commercial agent who may discharge any of the duties of a consul shall cause to be appointed three persons of like qualifications with those described in section 4557, who shall proceed to examine into the cause of complaint and who shall proceed and be governed in all their proceedings as provided by said section."

SEC. 7. That places appropriated and used upon all merchant vessels of the United States as a lodging for crews shall be properly lighted, drained, heated, and ventilated, properly protected from sea and weather, and, as far as practicable, properly shut off and protected from the effluvium of the cargo or bilge water; and every such crew space shall be kept free from goods or stores not being the personal property of any of the crew occupying said place during the voyage; that on all merchant vessels of the United States the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, except yachts, pilot boats, or vessels of any class of less than 200 tons register, every place appropriated to the crew of the vessel for lodgings shall have a space of not less than 120 cubic feet and not less than 18 square feet, measured on the floor or deck, for each seaman or apprentice lodged therein; Provided, That these space allotments may be reduced not more than 20 per cent in case a separate space is provided for mess-room purposes.

That in addition to the space allotment for lodgings hereinbefore provided, on all merchant vessels of the United States which in the ordinary course of their trade make voyages of more than three days' duration between ports, and which carry a crew of 12 or more seamen, there shall be constructed a compartment, suitably separated from other spaces, for hospital purposes, and such compartment shall have at least one bunk for every 12 seamen constituting her crew, provided that not more than six bunks shall be required in any case.

The spaces for the crew shall have wooden flooring, or be covered with some substance impervious to water and a nonconductor of heat and which may be easily cleaned. The sides and ceilings shall be painted in a light oil color, and iron ceilings or walls, if used, must be provided with a covering which will prevent dripping. Each seaman or apprentice shall be allowed a berth, at least 2 feet in width and 6 feet in length, for his sole use, and the distance between the floor and the bottom of the lower berth shall be at least 10 inches, and not more than 2 berths shall be in a tier.

Every steamboat of the United States plying upon the Mississippi River or its tributaries shall furnish an appropriate place for the crew, which shall conform to the requirements of this section, so far as they are applicable thereto, by providing sleeping room in the engine room of such steamboat, properly protected from the cold, wind, and rain by means of suitable awnings or screens on either side of the guards or sides and forward, reaching from the boiler deck to the lower or main deck, under the direction and approval of the Supervising Inspector General of Steam Vessels, and shall be properly heated.

Every merchant vessel of the United States, the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, having, exclusive of licensed officers, a deck crew of 20 or more men (except fishing vessels, yachts, pilot boats, and vessels of less than 200 gross tons) shall have for the use of the sailors at least one light, clean, and properly ventilated wash room, which shall be provided with not less than one washbasin for each two men of a watch, except those for whom individual washing accommodations are provided elsewhere. A special wash room shall be provided for the firemen, provided that their number is not less than 10, exclusive of licensed officers, so situated that the men can reach it on the way from the engine rooms, boiler rooms, or coal bunkers before entering their quarters, and of such size that at least half the watch can wash at the same time. It shall be provided with at least one shower bath for each four men of the watch, and with at least one washbasin for each two men of the watch, except those for whom individual washing and bathing accommodations are provided elsewhere. The sides and ceilings of all wash rooms shall be painted in light oil color. The wash rooms shall be supplied with sufficient quantities of soap and running water, both hot and cold wherever practicable, and in the case of firemen at least two gallons of fresh water shall be available for the use of each man at the end of his watch. Wash rooms shall be cleaned at least once each day.

The equipment hereinbefore provided for shall be certified to by the local inspectors at each annual inspection.

Any failure to comply with this section shall subject the owner or owners of such vessels to a penalty of not less than $50 or more than $500.

SEC. 8. That section 4596 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Second. For neglecting or refusing without reasonable cause to join his vessel or to proceed to sea in his vessel or for absence without leave at any time within 24 hours of the vessel's sailing from any port, either at the commencement or during the progress of the voyage, or for absence at any time without leave and without sufficient reason from his vessel and from his duty, not amounting to desertion, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than two day's pay or sufficient to defray any expenses which shall have been properly incurred in hiring a substitute.

"Third. For quitting the vessel without leave after her arrival at the port of delivery and before she is placed in security, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than one month's pay.

"Fifth. For continued willful disobedience to lawful command or continued willful neglect of duty at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons, on bread and water, with full rations every fifth day, until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture, for every 24 hours' continuance of such disobedience or neglect, of a sum of not more than 12 days' pay, or by imprisonment for not more than 3 months, at the discretion of the court.

"Sixth. For assaulting any master or other licensed officer by imprisonment for not more than two years.

"Eighth. For any act of smuggling for which he is convicted and whereby loss or damage is occasioned to the master or owner, he shall be liable to pay such master or owner such a sum as is sufficient to reimburse the master or owner for such loss or damage, and the whole or any part of his wages may be retained in satisfaction or on account of such liability, and he shall be liable to imprisonment for a period of not more than 12 months.

"Ninth. For each refusal or willful neglect to engage in boat or fire practice or drill, and for each refusal when engaged in boat drill, and so directed by the master, to efficiently assist in launching the ship's lifeboats the seaman shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year and by forfeiture of all wages earned: Provided, That no boat or fire drill shall be called for the purpose of preventing the men from quitting the service. The provisions of this section shall apply to all merchant vessels of the United States."

SEC. 9. That section 4600 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4600. It shall be the duty of all consular officers to discountenance insubordination by every means in their power and, where the local authorities can be usefully employed for that purpose, to lend their aid and use their exertions to that end in the most effectual manner. In all cases where seamen or officers are accused, the consular officer shall inquire into the facts and proceed as provided in section 4583 of the Revised Statutes; and the officer discharging such seaman shall enter upon the crew list and shipping articles and official log the cause of such discharge and the particulars in which the cruel or unusual treatment consisted and subscribe his name thereto officially. He shall read the entry made in the official log to the master, and his reply thereto, if any, shall likewise be entered and subscribed in the same manner."

SEC. 10. That section 4611 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

SEC. 4611. Flogging and all other forms of corporal punishment are hereby prohibited on board of any vessel, and no form of corporal punishment on board of any vessel shall be deemed justifiable, and any master or other officer thereof who shall violate the aforesaid provisions of this section, or either thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than two years. Whenever any officer other than the master of such vessel shall violate any provision of this section it shall be the duty of such master to surrender such officer to the proper authorities as soon as practicable, provided he has actual knowledge of the misdemeanor, or complaint thereof is made within three days after reaching port. Any failure on the part of such master to use due diligence to comply herewith, which failure shall result in the escape of such officer, shall render the master or the vessel liable in damages for such flogging or corporal punishment to the person illegally punished by such officer.

SEC. 11. That section 23 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," approved December 21, 1898, be, and is hereby, amended as regards the items of water and butter, so that in lieu of a daily requirement of 4 quarts of water there shall be a requirement of 5 quarts of water every day, and in lieu of a daily requirement of 1 ounce of butter there shall be a requirement of 2 ounces of butter every day.

SEC. 12. That section 24 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," approved December 21, 1898, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 24. That section 10 of chapter 121 of the laws of 1884, as amended by section 3 of chapter 421 of the laws of 1886, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 10 (a). That it shall be, and is hereby, made unlawful in any case to pay any seaman wages in advance of the time when he has actually earned the same, or to pay such advance wages to any other person, or to give any order, note, or other evidence of indebtedness of any kind whatsoever, or for any purpose, conditioned directly or indirectly on the deduction of the amount specified from the wages of a seaman, except as hereinafter provided.

"'Any person violating any of the foregoing provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100, and may also be imprisoned for a period of not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court. The payment of such advance wages or allotment shall in no case except as herein provided absolve the vessel or the master or the owner thereof from the full payment of wages after the same shall have been actually earned, and shall be no defense to a libel suit or action for the recovery of such wages. If any person shall demand or receive, either directly or indirectly, from any seaman or other person seeking employment as seaman, or from any person on his behalf, any remuneration whatever for providing him with employment, or shall by any threat or force dissuade or prevent or endeavor to dissuade or prevent any person from taking employment on board any vessel, or shall by any threat or force dissuade or prevent or endeavor to dissuade or prevent any person from remaining in the service of any vessel on which he has shipped, or by any threat or force induce or compel any person to disregard or disobey any lawful order or orders of the master or other licensed officer of the vessel on which he is shipped he shall for every such offense be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not more than six months or fined not more than $500.

"'(c) That no allotment shall be valid unless in writing and signed by and approved by the shipping commissioner. It shall be the duty of the said commissioner to examine such allotments and the parties to them and enforce compliance with the law. All stipulations for the allotment of any part of the wages of a seaman during his absence which are made at the commencement of the voyage shall be inserted in the agreement and shall state the amounts and times of the payments to be made and the persons to whom the payments are to be made.

"'(d) That no allotment except as provided for in this section shall be lawful. Any person who shall falsely claim to be such relation, as above described, of a seaman under this section shall for every such offense be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court.

"'(e) That this section shall apply as well to seamen engaged in ports of the United States for service on foreign vessels as to seamen employed on vessels of the United States, and any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated its provisions shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for a similar violation.

"'The master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel seeking clearance from a port of the United States shall present his shipping articles, so far as they relate to the engagement of seamen in the United States, or a certified copy of the same, at the office of clearance, and no clearance shall be granted any such vessel unless the provisions of this paragraph have been complied with.

"'(f) That under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the Commissioner of Navigation shall make regulations to carry out this section.'"

SEC. 13. That section 4536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4536. No wages due or accruing to any seaman or apprentice shall be subject to attachment or arrestment from any court, and every payment of wages to a seaman or apprentice shall be valid in law, notwithstanding any previous sale or assignment of wages or of any attachment, encumbrance, or arrestment thereon; and no assignment or sale of wages or of salvage made prior to the accruing thereof shall bind the party making the same, except such allotments as are authorized by this title. This section shall apply to fishermen employed on fishing vessels as well as to seamen: Provided, That nothing contained in this or any preceding section shall interfere with the order by any court regarding the payment by any seaman of any part of his wages for the support and maintenance of his wife and minor children."

SEC. 14. That no vessel, except those navigating rivers exclusively and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel, unless the crew in each department shall include a sufficient number of seamen who understand the languages of both officers and crew, through whom the orders of the officers may be communicated in a manner to be readily understood by the seamen, in any department, to whom such orders are given. The number of seamen through whom the orders of the officers may be transmitted shall not be less than the number of lifeboats such vessel is required to carry, and at least one of such seamen shall be assigned to each lifeboat.

No vessel carrying passengers, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have a sufficient number of efficient lifeboat hands, which in no case shall be less than two for each lifeboat that such ship is required to carry, to launch and handle the prescribed lifeboats and life rafts.

A seaman shall be entitled to the rating of efficient lifeboat hand who has shown by practical tests to the satisfaction of the master that he is qualified to perform any duty required in the launching and handling of lifeboats and life rafts and their equipment, including the stowing of passengers, swinging out, lowering, detaching and hoisting, and use of oars. Such tests shall be subject to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who shall, through collectors of customs, local inspectors, and other officers of the Government, enforce the laws and regulations for the handling of lifeboats and life rafts and the efficiency of lifeboat hands.

This section shall take effect on and after the following dates, respectively, in the case of vessels navigating the ocean or sounds and bay connected therewith or the Great Lakes and connecting waters, and authorized by certificate of inspection to carry the following number of passengers:

On July 1, 1913, 500 passengers or over.

On August 1, 1913, 200 passengers and less than 500.

On October 1, 1913, less than 200.

Any violation of any provision of this section shall subject the master or owner of such vessel to a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500.

SEC. 15. A seaman shall not be entitled to the rating of A. B.—that is to say, of an able-bodied seaman—unless he is at least 18 years of age, possesses a sufficient knowledge of the English language to understand the necessary orders that may be given to him in the course of the performance of his duties, and has served on deck at sea for at least three years. The service herein prescribed may be proved by certificates of discharge by a master before a shipping commissioner or by other proof satisfactory to officers designated by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who shall issue certificates to able-bodied seamen in a form to be prescribed by him, and in the case of seamen shipped abroad on vessels of the United States, such service may be proved by certificates of discharge by a master before consuls of the United States.

No vessel carrying passengers for hire, except those navigating rivers exclusively, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have as part of her crew a sufficient number of wheelsmen or quartermasters and lookout men of not less rating than that of able seamen: Provided, That if upon examination, under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce and Labor, as to eyesight, hearing, and physical strength and knowledge of the duties, men found competent may be so employed, although they may have served only one year at sea, and no other men than those so qualified shall be employed at the wheel or as lookout. And while at sea the wheelsmen or quartermasters and lookout men shall be divided into at least three watches, which shall be kept on duty successively; but this requirement shall not apply to yachts, vessels of less than 300 gross tons, or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 12 hours: Provided, That no member of the crew shall be required to be on duty more than 12 hours out of any 24 hours, except in case of emergency. But this exemption shall in no way interfere with the authority of the proper officers of the Government to make such lawful regulations or orders as they may deem necessary to secure safety at sea and prevent excessive hours of labor.

Any failure to comply with this provision shall subject the master or owner of such vessel to a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $500.

SEC. 16. That the owner, agent, or master of every barge which, while in tow for 50 miles or more through the open sea, has sustained or caused any accident, shall be subject in all respects to the provisions of sections 10, 11, 12, and 13, of chapter 344 of the Statutes at Large, approved June 20, 1874, and the reports therein prescribed shall be transmitted by collectors of customs to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who shall transmit annually to Congress a summary of such reports during the previous fiscal year, together with a brief statement of the action of the department in respect to such accidents.

SEC. 17. That in the judgment of Congress articles in treaties and conventions of the United States, in so far as they provide for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of the United States in foreign countries, and for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of foreign nations in the United States and the Territories and possessions thereof, and for the cooperation, aid, and protection of competent legal authorities in effecting such arrest or imprisonment, ought to be terminated, and to this end the President be, and he is hereby, requested and directed, within 90 days after the passage of this act, to give notice to the several Governments, respectively, that so much as hereinbefore described of all such treaties and conventions between the United States and foreign Governments will terminate on the expiration of such periods after notices have been given as may be required in such treaties and conventions.

SEC. 18. That upon the expiration after notice of the periods required, respectively, by said treaties and conventions and of one year in the case of the independent State of the Kongo, so much as hereinbefore described in each and every one of said articles shall be deemed and held to have expired and to be of no force and effect, and thereupon so much of sections 4,081 and 5,280 of the Revised Statutes as relates to the arrest or imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of foreign nations in the United States and Territories and possessions thereof, and for the cooperation, aid, and protection of competent legal authorities in effecting such arrest or imprisonment, shall be and is hereby repealed.

SEC. 19. That this act shall take effect, as to all vessels of the United States, 90 days after its passage, and as to foreign vessels 12 months after its passage, save and except that such parts hereof as provide for the abrogation of any stipulation by treaty or convention with any foreign nation shall only take effect after such notice, and at the expiration of such time as may be required by the terms of such treaty, stipulation, or convention.

Section 5,280, Revised Statutes, repealed.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the two main objects of this bill are the amelioration of the condition of seamen and greater safety of life at sea. One main feature of it is a provision for the abrogation of treaties with foreign countries under which deserters from their ships can be arrested in our ports. Unfortunately, bitter antagonism has arisen between the advocates and the opponents of this bill, each expressing very radical views. The Committee on Commerce of the Senate has given a hearing to all who were interested. It has given greater consideration to this bill than to any other measure before it at this session, and has reported this substitute, which, it is thought, will secure a very great advance in the condition of the seamen. While it imposes very severe restrictions and duties upon the shipowners, the amount of hardship involved is not greater than that which they should willingly accept.

The committee has also considered the question of our relations with foreign countries. This bill interferes with existing treaties with some 18 or 20 nations; but in that we have sought in every way to express the intention of Congress with decorum and proper diplomatic spirit, and we think the modifications required in our treaties are not more than should be accepted by the shipping interests of foreign countries.

In no field of legislation has there been greater advance in recent years than in laws relating to the welfare of American workmen. Numerous laws have beeen passed, both by State legislatures and by Congress, intended to protect the life, limb, and health of men and women employed in all occupations, but especially in those regarded as hazardous. Children have been excluded from many occupations, and their employment radically limited in others; hours of labor have been reduced, and working conditions have been very generally improved in practically all of our leading industries.

It is one of the important purposes of this bill to carry the spirit of that legislation into the laws and regulations affecting American seamen engaged in the merchant marine of the United States.

Many of the worst evils incident to sea life have already disappeared in the normal development of water transportation. Many have been abolished by legislative enactment or departmental regulations. It will be admitted, however, by all who are familiar with existing conditions that there still exist certain conditions that ought to be remedied. While arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion have been almost wholly discarded in actual practice, the statutory authority and treaty obligation to enforce such arrest and imprisonment still remain. One of the important purposes of this bill is to secure the abrogation of all treaty provisions relating to arrest and imprisonment of seamen, and, contingent thereon, to repeal the sections of our Statutes at Large which carry these provisions into effect in the United States.

In considering the House bill and framing its amendment the Senate committee has constantly had in mind the paramount purpose of promoting safety at sea, so far as it can be accomplished by requirements relating to the number, efficiency, discipline, and training of the crew. In this connection special attention is called to section 14, which provides:

No vessel carrying passengers, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have a sufficient number of efficient lifeboat hands, which in no case shall be less than two for each lifeboat that such ship is required to carry, to launch and handle the prescribed lifeboats and life rafts.

And it provides a method of testing the efficiency of such boat hands.

In support of the provisions of the section just mentioned, the ninth paragraph of section 8 provides a penalty for refusal on the part of seamen to engage in boat practice or drill. The rules and regulations promulgated by the Bureau of Inspection of the Department of Commerce and Labor, which by statute have been given the force and effect of law, provide that the license of an officer of any vessel may be revoked in the event of his refusal to require fire and boat drills at such intervals and in such manner as are laid down in these rules and regulations.

It is believed, therefore, that the provisions of this bill, taken in connection with existing rules and regulations, will establish a high standard of lifeboat efficiency in the merchant marine of the United States—probably a higher standard than exists in any other nation of the world.

I now ask the attention of the Senate to a recapitulation of the provisions of the bill as recommended by the Senate committee. I shall endeavor to compare the paragraphs or sections, as recommended by the committee, both with the existing law and with the provisions of the House bill.

Section 1 of the amendment, found on page 19, is a mere redrawing of section 4516 of the Revised Statutes, and is in the exact language of the House bill. It provides:

In case of desertion or casualty resulting in the loss of one or more of the seamen, the master must ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same or higher grade or rating with those whose places they fill, and report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, without incurring the penalty prescribed by the two preceding sections.

The two preceding sections relate to the engagement of seamen. Not only is this section in the exact language of the House bill, but it does not differ from existing law save in slight changes of phraseology. On this section there was absolute agreement on the part of everyone.

A part, however, of section 1 as set forth in the House bill is incorporated in section 2 of the committee substitute. That is done because there is little relation between the two portions of section 1 as it came from the House.

Section 2 reads:

In all merchant vessels of the United States the sailors shall, while at sea, be divided into at least two and the firemen into at least three watches, which shall be kept on duty successively for the performance of ordinary work incident to the sailing and management of the vessel.

This is an important addition here, Mr. President, to the present law. The present law does not provide for the division of seamen into watches. The only existing restriction upon requirements as to hours of labor is contained in laws and regulations which provide that the supervising inspector and the local inspector must see that a vessel is properly manned—that it has sufficient seamen—and in performing that duty they incidentally look after the welfare of the men with a view to providing against excessive hours of labor. There have been, however, very many complaints that in some instances the men have been required to work 20 hours consecutively, or even more. This bill divides the hours of labor of seamen into watches, and thereby limits the hours of those on deck to 12 and of firemen to 8.

The strongest opposition was made by certain vessel owners to the provision for three watches for the firemen. The committee, however, were unanimous in the opinion that to subject a man to 12 hours' labor in a fire hold is excessive; and notwithstanding it may require the services of an additional man or number of men on a considerable number of boats we think that should be carried into positive law.

Following the language I have just read occurs this:

But this provision shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, all the sailors or all the firemen or the whole crew is needed for the maneuvering of the vessel.

On this clause there was a considerable difference of opinion between the seamen and vessel owners. The form in which the sailors desired to have it enacted was this:

But this provision shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, the whole crew is needed for the maneuvering of the vessel.

That is, all recognized that emergencies might occur when men, whether on watch or not, would necessarily be called out. The seamen favored limiting this emergency to occasions in which the calling out of the whole crew was required. The vessel men, on the other hand, insisted that the language should be:

When in the judgment of the master or other officer more than one watch or the whole crew shall be required.

This is an amendment which, at first sight, seems very plausible. That is, if the emergency is not of the gravest nature, and one or two or three men more are required, but not the whole crew, why not call them out?

To that the seamen objected, and, I think, justly and properly, saying that it would afford a constant excuse for evading the law by calling out one, two, or three men when no real emergency existed, and thereby nullifying entirely the purpose of the watch and watch system. The committee, however, did make a change in the bill as it came from the House. Instead of limiting the emergency to one in which the whole crew is required, they provided:

When, in the judgment of the master or other officer, all the sailors or all the firemen or the whole crew is needed.

That is, an emergency might occur in the fire hold; as, for example, a pipe might burst and there would be no occasion whatever to call out the men on the deck. On the other hand, an emergency might occur requiring all hands on deck and there would be no call for extra men in the fire hold. We modified the House provision to that extent, but rejected the provision under which one or more men of a watch could be called out.

The next provision is one in which we practically followed the House bill, except that the holidays are specified.

While the vessel is in a safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sundays or the following-named legal holidays.

The language of the House bill was:

No unnecessary work on Sundays or legal holidays.

The committee, on considering that provision, found that there were no holidays specified by United States statutes, and it chose to set forth in this section specific holidays generally recognized by the several States, which are New Year's Day, Washington's Birthday, Good Friday, the Fourth of July, Labor Day, Columbus Day, Thanksgiving, and Christmas—eight in all.

But this provision shall not prevent the doing of work necessary to the dispatch of a vessel on regular schedule or when ready to proceed on her voyage.

That is the same as in the House bill. Then follows:

At all other times while the vessel is in a safe harbor, nine hours, inclusive of the anchor watch, shall constitute a day's work. Whenever the master of any vessel shall fail to comply with this section, the seaman shall be entitled to discharge from such vessel and to receive the wages earned. But this section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels, yachts, vessels of less than 300 gross tons or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 24 hours.

In that regard there is a change from the House bill. I wish to say, Mr. President and Senators, that one of the greatest difficulties in framing this bill has been to fix general regulations for the shipping of the United States. With all the varied sizes of the boats, with the different speeds of different vessels, the different lengths of the runs which they make, the difficulty of fixing uniform regulations is perfectly obvious. One regulation might be a very proper one where a boat runs only 12 hours and entirely an inadequate provision where a boat runs a week, and vice versa. On a long voyage regulations might be enforced which would be extremely burdensome on a short run. On short runs much of the time of the men is spent in port; they have opportunities for rest and recuperation which would not belong to the sailors on a long voyage. For instance, if a voyage was only 10 hours and a general provision that firemen shall work only 8 hours were in force, it would require two shifts of firemen. On the other hand, it must be said that at the close of 10 hours the firemen would have a period of rest, varying according to the itinerary of the voyage.

So the Senate committee inserted this provision, that the rules should not apply where the vessel is "less than 300 gross tons or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 24 hours." To guard against hardship and oppression, however, the Senate committee adds this provision:

That no member of the crew shall be required to be on duty more than 12 hours out of any 24 hours, except in cases of emergency as hereinbefore provided. But this exemption shall in no way interfere with the authority of the proper officers of the Government to make such lawful regulations or orders as they may deem necessary to secure safety at sea and prevent excessive hours of labor.

Section 3 does not differ materially from the existing law. There is a slight difference from the House bill which, I think I may confidently assert, is an improvement. This section has relation to the payment of wages to seamen. It provides that—

The master or owner of any vessel making coasting voyages shall pay to every seaman his wages within two days after the termination of the agreement under which he was shipped.

The regulation in the case of foreign shipping authorizes a slightly longer interval. Under the existing laws vessels sailing from a port on the Atlantic to a port of the Pacific or vice versa are subject to the same regulations as foreign vessels, and a somewhat longer interval is allowed before the payment may be made. The committee thought it best to put voyages between the Atlantic and the Pacific on the same footing with other domestic shipping. The reason for this is accentuated by the opening of the Panama Canal. In any event we think it a just regulation to require that the wages be paid on such a voyage as promptly as on any other domestic trip.

Section 4 of the bill makes a very vital change in the existing law. It provides that—

Every seaman on a vessel of the United States which, prior to the completion of her voyage, shall enter any port for the purpose of loading or delivering cargo shall, upon demand made subsequent to entering such port, be entitled to receive from the master of the vessel to which he belongs, within 48 hours after demand therefor, one-half part of the wages which he shall have earned at said port.

The vital change is this:

And all stipulations of contract to the contrary shall be null and void.

Under the existing law a payment may be made in port, but the sailor can contract away his right to demand it. This provision provides that no stipulation of contract shall prevent him from demanding a share of the wages due.

There is this further proviso for the protection of the vessel not contained in the House bill:

That wages earned during the first five days of service shall not be due or subject to demand prior to the completion of the voyage or expiration of contract.

That is, on a voyage of 30 days the seaman could not claim half the wages for 30 but only for 25 days, omitting the first 5 days.

Then follows this language:

When the voyage is ended every seaman shall be entitled to the remainder of the wages which shall then be due to him. This section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts.

That is existing law.

There is a change made in the bill, however, by omission. The House bill contained a provision making this section applicable to foreign ships. The Senate committee struck that out, as we do not believe that we have any right to interfere with the management of foreign ships on articles signed abroad. But we did make it applicable as follows:

Provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels owned in major part by American citizens, corporations, or holding companies when such vessels are in harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement.

That provision is one about which there may be a variety of opinion, but the committee voted to put it in.

Section 5 is severed from the paragraph in which it appeared in the House bill, as it is thought that it should be made to amend the section to which it applies. The present statute provides, in effect, that any release, signed and attested by a sailor, "shall operate as a mutual discharge and settlement of all demands for wages between the parties thereto, on account of wages, in respect of the past voyage or engagement." Then follows this proviso, which is in both the House bill and the Senate amendment, and is a modification of the existing law:

Provided, That any court having competent jurisdiction may, upon good cause shown, set aside such release and take such action as justice may require.

The committees of both Houses, I take it, thought that this was a fair provision to relieve the seaman from the effect of having signed a release when he did it ignorantly or without a proper understanding of what he was doing.

Section 6 contains a somewhat material provision incorporated in both Senate and House bills. Under the existing law the master or second officer and a majority of the crew may, while a boat is in a foreign port, complain that she "is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea because she is leaky or insufficiently supplied with sails, rigging, anchors, or any other equipment, or that the crew is insufficient to man her, or that her provisions, stores, and supplies are not or have not been during the voyage sufficient or wholesome." Then the question is put up to a consul to have a survey made. The House provision and the Senate provision as reported are the same. It gives the authority to a majority of the crew to make complaint, so that the clause would read "the first or second officer or a majority of the crew" may make this complaint and cause the survey.

This, Mr. President, it seems, is a somewhat severe requirement; a boat may be tied up in this way; but it squares with the law of Great Britain and, I believe, several other maritime countries. While it seems severe, it does not, on the other hand, seem fair that the crew of a boat should be compelled to go to sea when a majority of them think her to be leaky or unseaworthy, or that there are not sufficient supplies upon her.

Section 7 has been very carefully drawn by the Senate committee. We have given much time to it and examined the laws of other countries, especially Norway and Germany. It has two classes of provisions, one relating to boats already built and the other to boats hereafter to be constructed. The Senate committee increases the cubic space and the floor space which the House bill provided. The House bill provided 16 feet of floor space, which the Senate bill enlarges to 18. The House bill provided 100 feet of cubic space; the Senate bill under this amendment provides 120.

The bill as recommended by the Senate committee also provides for a separate hospital section and for proper care and sanitation. I think it is hardly desirable for me to go into this at length. The provision as contained in the bill now before the Senate is, it seems to me, a very material improvement on the House bill. It not only gives greater space, a separate compartment for a hospital, but goes more into detail as to the provision for cleanliness. The section, I may say, provides adequately for suitable washing facilities, and especially for the firemen, to be arranged in such a manner as not to expose them when overheated from work in the furnace room.

Section 8 is a definition of the offenses committed by seamen. This is for the most part existing law. There are two changes. One of them is of quite an important nature. I will go over this hurriedly:

Whenever any seaman or apprentice lawfully engaged on any merchant vessel of the United States commits any of the following offenses he shall be punished as follows:

The punishment is—

by forfeiture of all or any part of the clothes or effects he leaves on board and of all or any part of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned.

That is the existing law.

There is one change from the existing law running through this section contained both in the House and the Senate bill. The boats engaged in the domestic trade are put on the same footing as boats in the foreign trade. As the law now is there are some slight, not very material, differences between the punishment inflicted in the two cases, the idea being, perhaps, that desertion and other offenses in a foreign port is a more serious matter.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In the first subdivision of this section the provision for imprisonment has been omitted, or do I understand that at some previous Congress it was stricken out?

Mr. BURTON. No.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is stricken out.

Mr. BURTON. I will explain that. I am very much obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is an omission here.

Mr. BURTON. If he deserts, as the law now is, when in a foreign port, he not only forfeits his clothes and the effects he leaves on board and all or any part of the wages earned, but may also, at the discretion of the court, be punished by imprisonment of not more than one month. That is stricken out.

The second paragraph contains a rather material change from the existing law:

For neglecting or refusing without reasonable cause to join his vessel or to proceed to sea in his vessel or for absence without leave at any time within 24 hours of the vessel's sailing from any port.

If that offense occurs in a foreign port, he is now punishable at the discretion of the court by imprisonment of not more than one month. The imprisonment is stricken ont.

The third offense is that of quitting the vessel without leave. Under the existing law the punishment is the same, whether in a foreign or domestic port. There is no change except a verbal one to strike out the enumeration of the two.

In the fourth, "willful disobedience to any lawful command at sea," the punishment is severe; "by being at the option of the master placed in irons until such disobedience shall cease." All parties who appeared before us agreed that this punishment, severe as it may seem, is necessary for the maintenance of discipline on board a vessel at sea.

Fifth, "for continued willful disobedience to lawful command." There is no change in the existing law except it recognizes the fact that the difference is abolished between domestic and foreign trade.

In the sixth subdivision there is, I believe, no change from the existing law except striking out the words "in whatever trade engaged," to make it square with the rest of the section. The Senate committee, however, decided to report a modification here. As the law now is and as the bill passed the House this was the provision:

For assaulting any master or mate, by imprisonment for not more than two years.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to get this right. I call attention to section 4596, the first subdivision, which contains this provision:

For desertion, by imprisonment for not more than three months, and by forfeiture of all or any part of the clothes or effects he leaves on board, and of all or any part of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned.

That is in the Revised Statutes of 1878. The Senator is so much more familiar with these provisions than I that I wanted to be sure that this is the existing law.

Mr. BURTON. That is the existing law.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator had spoken of one month's imprisonment, as if it was a matter left to the discretion of the court; but this would appear to be three months' imprisonment, and a forfeiture of clothing and a forfeiture of wages.

Mr. BURTON. I do not know but that I misunderstood the Senator from South Dakota in regard to that. I did not follow with the utmost care the reading. So far as the penalty is concerned, it is changed. The existing law is also at the discretion of the court by imprisonment for not more than one month.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then there has been a change?

Mr. BURTON. There has been a modification of the statute, if the Senator is reading from the statute of 1878, or one prior to that date.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is; and that is the point I wanted to make an issue of, because I knew the Senator to be familiar with these changes.

Mr. BURTON. The Senate committee thought best to change the language "master or mate" to "master or other licensed officer." This seems to us a much better provision. The offense might be as serious if the seaman assaulted the chief engineer as if he assaulted the first mate. I do not think any special objection was made to that change.

The seventh provision includes punishment "for willfully damaging the vessel, or embezzling or willfully damaging any of the stores or cargo." No material change is made from the present law, except that it includes the amendments already made clear that there is to be no distinction between the foreign and the domestic trade. I may say, that I may make myself entirely clear, that trade with Canada, Mexico, and the West Indies was put on the same footing with domestic trade under the old statute.

The eighth paragraph provides punishment for any act of smuggling which is certainly no more severe than the present law, and I think everyone is satisfied with it.

The ninth subdivision awakened some little opposition. It was not in the bill as passed by the House, but the Senate committee thought, in view of the supreme importance of skill in the handling of lifeboats, there should be a provision for frequent lifeboat drills, and that if a seaman refused to take part in those drills he should be punished. So we framed this provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has just said that subdivision 9 of section 8 is not in the House bill. In order that we may fully understand it, may I ask him whether it is in the present law?

Mr. BURTON. It is not in the present law.

Mr. CUMMINS. So it is an entirely new provision.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall have occasion after the Senator has finished to comment upon that particular provision.

Mr. BURTON. The new provision is:

For each refusal or willful neglect to engage in boat or fire practice or drill, and for each refusal when engaged in boat drill, and so directed by the master, to efficiently assist in launching the ship's lifeboats the seaman shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year and by forfeiture of all wages earned.

Mr. President, I repeat that we thought lifeboat drills and fire drills were of such importance that a severe penalty ought to be imposed if the seaman refused to engage in them.

We have heard a great deal about the loss of life on the Titanic and on the Rio and other boats. We must recognize that in a case of emergency efficient boat hands are necessary to promptly handle the lifeboats, and in order to obtain the necessary skill, to meet emergencies or danger, these frequent drills should be had. We do not think it unwarranted to visit a severe penalty upon a seaman who refuses; otherwise we would have felt that all our agitation in regard to lifeboats, all the interest that this has excited since the frightful loss of the Titanic, was more or less lacking in practicability, to say the least.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just one more suggestion in order that everybody may understand the bill as the Senator proceeds. The subdivision applies when the vessel is in a safe port as well as when the vessel is at sea. I am right about that?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly. Many of the lifeboat drills would necessarily be held while the boat is in the harbor. The objection was made by the seamen that this provision could be used as an instrument of oppression; that just as a man was about to leave his boat the master might order a lifeboat drill and prevent him from exercising the liberty which he otherwise would have to leave. To meet the situation the Senate committee put in this proviso:

Provided, That no boat or fire drill shall be called for the purpose of preventing the men from quitting the service.

I do not think that really assumes any very great practical importance, but in order to make assurance doubly sure it was inserted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. What protection would the seaman have as against the inner consciousness or purpose of the man who was calling the drill?

Mr. BURTON. He could say, "I intend to leave, and you shall not order me to do this at this time"; and, again, if the object of the master was clearly to prevent men from leaving, he could not enforce the order.

Mr. BORAH. How could anybody except the man who was giving the order know what the intent was?

Mr. BURTON. It is more sweeping than that. A man can go if he wants to go. He can say, as I have just related, "I desire to leave the ship; I will not obey your order to engage in this fire drill"; and in that case he is relieved from the penalty herein provided. So, whether it is for a legitimate purpose, a bona fide fire drill, or to prevent him from leaving, in either case the seaman has his remedy in the way of leaving.

Mr. BORAH. By quitting the service?

Mr. BURTON. By quitting the service.

Mr. CUMMINS. But suppose when the boat reaches port the master should issue an order that there will be a boat drill or a fire drill every day during the stay of the boat in port, at 3 o'clock or any other hour, under the terms of this provision it would absolutely prevent any seaman from leaving the boat or quitting the service without incurring the penalty. It will afford no barrier to his leaving the ship at any time he pleases.

Mr. BURTON. I would say that, in drawing a statute of this kind, I do not think it is desirable to take into account the possibilities of an intent that was probably criminal. I do not really believe there is any necessity for this proviso here, but it is put in merely to make it secure.

Mr. CLAPP. I am not as familiar with the bill as I should like to be, but I wish to ask, Does the Senator from Ohio mean that the seamen can avoid the penalty flowing from the order and its refusal by merely declaring their intention to leave and accompanying the declaration with the fact of leaving?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. That is not my understanding of the language.

Mr. JONES. Would not the mutiny provision of the law meet this situation sufficiently?

Mr. BURTON. I think there is some doubt in regard to that. It seemed best to sever this out and make a separate provision. If the Members of the Senate think that this is too strong a provision, and that we can waive the necessity of fire-boat drills, the Senate committee has no special desire to keep in this provision. We think, however, as we have been making such loud protestations that we desire there should be skillful boatmen on these vessels, that we should provide that skill by compelling drills and compelling the men to take part in them.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I did not hear the question asked by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. BURTON. It was whether this would be covered by the mutiny law.

Mr. BORAH. Then, what I was going to ask was, whether there was any other provision of law which would cover the situation when the ship was at sea?

Mr. BURTON. I think when the ship is at sea there would be no doubt that this would be mutiny; whether it would when the ship was in port I question.

Mr. BORAH. If at sea, it would be covered by another provision of law?

Mr. BURTON. I am inclined to think so.

Mr. JONES. I want to say that, of course, I want to see these fire drills kept up; I think they ought to be required; but out of this agitation that we have had, I do not want to see us go to an extreme in our treatment of the sailor himself. It seems to me that the provision with reference to mutiny, punishment for disobedience of orders, and so forth, would furnish a reasonable precaution against refusals of this character.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is not the question there as to whether those provisions apply to a boat when she is lying in port and the crew may be off the ship part of the time and on the ship part of the time? That seems to be a place where it is necessary in order to have efficient boat drills to have a great many of such boat drills, and if the law as to mutiny at sea can not reach the case of a vessel in port, it would seem that some other provision is required.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] that it is to be assumed, when the vessel is in port, if one seaman leaves the ship his place can be supplied and the boat drills can proceed. I think if a man wanted to leave the ship or wanted to incur the penalty of dismissal for a refusal to obey orders of this sort, the only penalty ought to be dismissal from the service. I think that in that way efficiency of a higher order could be secured than by an attempt to imprison a man who would rather leave the service than engage in boat drills.

Mr. BURTON. While there is much in what the Senator from Iowa says, I think he hardly gives sufficient emphasis to the difficulty in many cases of obtaining substitutes for members of crews who desert. No master of a boat desires that he have a changing crew. Crews work together; there is a kind of teamwork among them. Oftentimes it is necessary to substitute persons who are untried. They may have certificates of service which give them a very good standing, but on drill they will prove to be inferior seamen.

There is nothing in section 9 that really requires attention.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that the penalty in reference to the boat drill provision is less than the penalty in the case of mutiny at sea.

Mr. BURTON. It is very much less.

Mr. NELSON. The punishment is a great deal less, and it is made so purposely.

Mr. BURTON. Section 9 of the Senate bill, on page 30, as I have said, does not require attention. There is a vital change of existing law, and the provision is the same in the Senate substitute as in the House bill. In both the words of the existing law "reclaim deserters" are stricken out. That is made necessary by other provisions of the bill.

Section 10 of the Senate bill, on page 31, modifies existing law. Some years ago flogging and all other forms of corporal punishment were abolished and penalties prescribed for those who commit offenses of this sort. This act contains a provision which might seem to some severe, making the vessel itself liable for damages in case a subordinate officer is guilty of the flogging and the master allows him to escape. Perhaps it would be better to read that whole provision as it appears here:

SEC. 4611. Flogging and all other forms of corporal punishment are hereby prohibited on board of any vessel, and no form of corporal punishment on board of any vessel shall be deemed justifiable, and any master or other officer thereof who shall violate the aforesaid provisions of this section, or either thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than two years. Whenever any officer other than the master of such vessel shall violate any provision of this section it shall be the duty of such master to surrender such officer to the proper authorities as soon as practicable.

That also is existing law. In case the master fails to surrender the minor officer or to apprehend him and deliver him when required, and the failure results in his escape, the master is liable in damages. Just what the measure of damages would be in such a case it is hard to tell. I suppose, however, the master could be sued for the suffering inflicted on the seaman. The House bill goes further than the present law, and provides that in case the master fails to surrender the subordinate not only will he be liable for damages, but that the vessel will be liable. The Senate committee thought best to leave that provision in, but modified the House provision in some degree by adding after the words "as soon as practicable" the words:

Provided he—

That is, the master—

has actual knowledge of the misdemeanor, or complaint thereof is made within three days after reaching port.

I do not see that that weakens the House provision. It does, however, limit the liability of the master and the boat to one of two cases; that is, the master must either have actual knowledge of the flogging or complaint must be made within three days after reaching port. If complaint is not made within three days, but he has actual knowledge, the liability continues after the expiration of that period. If he did not have actual knowledge and complaint is made within the three days, the liability arises. It did not seem to us fair to hang over the master and the vessel unlimited liability, provided the master had no knowledge of the offense, and when, as might very probably be the case, the act was committed by some brutal mate or other subordinate without the concurrence or the knowledge of the master himself.

The next section—section 11—is one about which there is no disagreement whatever; that is as to the rations:

As regards the items of water and butter, so that in lieu of a daily requirement of 4 quarts of water there shall be a requirement of 5 quarts of water every day, and in lieu of a daily requirement of 1 ounce of butter there shall be a requirement of 2 ounces of butter every day.

The shipowners maintain that they already furnish a much larger supply of provisions than is required by statute, but it seemed to the committee that the mere fact that such was the custom was no reason why it should not be written down in the form of substantive law. There was no disagreement about that.

Section 12 makes a very material change in the existing law and, to an extent, affects our relations with other countries. I may say, Mr. President, that this section caused as much trouble as any part of the bill. It is now the law that it shall be "unlawful in any case to pay any seaman wages in advance of the time when he has actually earned the same or to pay such advance wages to any other person."

The reason for such a law is that the seaman is, in many particulars, peculiarly dependent. He may incur liability for board or lodging just before he receives employment, and he may, under existing law, give an order on the master of the vessel, providing that wages he shall thereafter earn, or a portion of them, shall be paid to his boarding-house keeper, or to the person to whom he is indebted. But there has been found, Mr. President, to be a serious evil resulting from this practice. A class of men, acting as employment agents, some of whom are known under the name of "crimps," take advantage of the sailor, so that when he sails from port the wages that he will earn have been assigned, in many instances, for no adequate consideration. The present law provides that it shall be unlawful to pay wages in advance of the time when they are actually earned, or to pay such advance wages to any other person.

It is contemplated by present law that, if the wages were paid to the seaman himself, he might pay them over to some one else. That is guarded against in the House provision. The Senate amendment adds to the House provision a prohibition against the making of a note or any other evidence of indebtedness conditioned upon deducting the amount from a seaman's wages.

It also prohibits paying any person for the shipment of seamen when the payment is to be deducted from the seamen's wages; that is, an employment agent can not go to the steamship company and say, "That seaman owes me such and such an amount for obtaining a job for him, and I ask you to pay this amount from the wages which he will earn." The whole system of advance payment of wages, of notes, and of allotments is wiped out, save under one exception, which exists under the present law—that the seaman may make an allotment to certain relatives. I will come to that in a moment. The section further provides:

Any person violating any of the foregoing provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars, and may also be imprisoned for a period of not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court.

Then follows this provision:

The payment of such advance wages or allotment shall in no case, except as herein provided, absolve the vessel or the master or the owner thereof from the full payment of wages after the same shall have been actually earned, and shall be no defense to a libel suit or action for the recovery of such wages.

Not only is it made a penal offense to make these advances or notes or allotments, but the fact of having paid them does not prevent the seaman from demanding his wages and receiving payment, notwithstanding the transaction which has preceded.

There is also a provision, which I have already read, which does away with the employment agent, the "crimp," and renders it impossible for the master, without incurring a serious penalty, to pay any amount from the seamen's wages to anyone who has acted as a shipping agent and obtained employment for the seamen. Formerly, in certain specified cases, these allotments could be made without incurring a penalty; that is, they were lawful in the case of any seaman engaged in a vessel bound from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific or on a vessel engaged in foreign trade; but there were certain exceptions as to seamen on vessels plying between ports of the United States or on vessels plying between the United States and Canada, Mexico, Cuba, and the West Indies. That is all wiped out, and this prohibition is broad and of general application. The only exception is the making of allotments of any portion of the wages the seaman may earn to his grandparents, parents, wife, sister, or child. The statute very carefully provides, however, that no allotment shall be valid unless it is in writing and signed by and approved by the shipping commissioner.

Mr. President, the original provision in the House bill made this provision applicable to foreign vessels; but when the attention of the seamen was called to this fact they conceded that they could not control the arrangements made abroad, and they waived their request for the provision which is contained in the House bill, namely:

That this section shall apply as well to foreign vessels as to vessels of the United States.

In fact, when the agent of the seamen read this paragraph again, he stated that it was not originally intended to apply to allotments made on foreign vessels, say, at Hamburg, at Liverpool, or at some other foreign port. The Senate substitute, however, retains this provision in a modified form:

(e) That this section shall apply as well to seamen engaged in ports of the United States for service on foreign vessels as to seamen employed on vessels of the United States, and any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated its provisions shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for a similar violation.

That is, if a foreign vessel, of the North German Lloyd, the Hamburg-American, or the Cunard Lines, whether a passenger steamer or a tramp boat, comes to the United States and engages, in any port of the United States, seamen for service, the law against advance payments of wages and allotments is applicable.

Mr. President, I think we have provided an unduly severe penalty for violation of this section. I think the law should apply to the engagement of seamen by foreign vessels in the United States quite as much as to the engagement of seamen in ports of the United States by domestic vessels, and that a penalty should be imposed:

The master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel seeking clearance from a port of the United States shall present his shipping articles, so far as they relate to the engagement of seamen in the United States, or a certified copy of the same, at the office of clearance——

That is all right thus far, but the language following is of serious import to shipping—and no clearance shall be granted any such vessel unless the provisions of this paragraph have been complied with.

Mr. President, I shall at the proper time propose an amendment as follows:

The collector of customs may require the master, owner, consignee, or agent of any vessel to file a bond in the sum of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000 to secure the penalty of any payment imposed by this section, and clearance may be refused if such bond is not filed.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAMBLE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. That would entirely vitiate the provision. Sailors, as we all know, are of a roving nature. They drift about from country to country and from ship to ship. Take the case of a sailor who has shipped on a foreign vessel in our country—we will say at the port of New York. That sailor is enlisted or employed on a foreign vessel, and this allotment law is violated. The "crimp," the man through whom the sailor is enlisted, succeeds in getting an allotment of his wages for two or three months. That sailor leaves and goes abroad. What is the good of a bond for him, and who is going to enforce it?

Mr. BURTON. Look, however, at the other side.

Mr. NELSON. The point is this: All the shipowner has to do is to file a copy of the shipping articles, so far as they relate to the enlistment of these men. That is a provision that can easily be complied with, and they ought to comply with it.

Mr. BURTON. This, however, is a question which might be litigated. A claim might be made that the boat has made one of these allotments when in fact she has not, and in that case——

Mr. NELSON. That is not the question here. If a copy of the shipping articles—that is, the enlistment papers—so far as they relate to these foreign seamen, is filed, that exonerates the ship and it is permitted to clear.

Mr. BURTON. Suppose the claim is made that there is some fraud in those articles; some one comes forward and says that they are not correct. That is not a question that you can in every case decide out of hand. I may say that a protest has come from the British Government against that paragraph.

Mr. NELSON. We are not legislating here for the British Government.

Mr. BURTON. Well, they use an argument which, I think, if the Senator from Minnesota will bear with me, is entitled to a very great deal of respect, which is that they are liable to be penalized in thousands of dollars if their boats do not leave on time, and to hold back a boat for the litigation or the settlement of a claim of this kind, whether or not they have made such a violation as this, is a penalty that is unduly severe. I state that for what it is worth.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator from Ohio indicate where the amendment he proposes would be inserted in the section?

Mr. BURTON. I will read it. Strike out the last two words of line 14 and all of lines 15 and 16, on page 35, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The collector of customs may require the master, owner, consignee, or agent of any vessel to file a bond in the sum of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000 to secure the penalty of any payment imposed by this section, and clearance may be refused if such bond is not filed.

I may say in this connection that I am informed by the seamen that they do not feel that there would be any serious trouble in the case of the liners, but that a tramp boat might come into some port, as Norfolk or Charleston or New York, and violate this law, and that, if it obtained clearance, no penalty could be enforced, as its next trip might be to Australia or South America, and it might not return, at least for a long period, to a port of the United States. For that reason this very drastic penalty was suggested. If the Senator from Florida will examine the law, he will see that it is out of keeping with other penalties throughout the whole of this section. There is a further provision in this section:

That under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the Commissioner of Navigation shall make the regulations to carry out this section.

Section 13 is one which does not materially differ from the existing law. It protects the wages due or owing seamen or apprentices. A change in its phraseology is made necessary by the provisions of the preceding section, which enlarge the prohibitions against payment from the wages which a seaman is to earn; that is, instead of "advance securities," the language contained in the present law, the word "allotments" is employed.

Both the House and the Senate bills make this section applicable to fishermen employed on fishing vessels. In this section there is no difference between the House and the Senate provisions.

I come now to a very important section of the bill, section 14. In this section the provision as it came from the House would absolutely exclude the American merchant marine from the foreign trade on the Pacific coast. It would require all crews there sailing from Hongkong to San Francisco or Seattle to understand not only the orders of the masters, but also the English language, practically to pass an examination in the English language. The committee have the very decided opinion that this provision is too drastic and severe. However much we would like to see these boats manned by American citizens or by Caucasians, there is a condition which we can not ignore. Boats of all other countries run either with Chinese or Japanese crews, and, in addition to that, many of those boats receive large subsidies from their Governments. We can, of course, by one fell swoop take our flag off the Pacific, except in coastwise trade, but we do not think it best to do so. We, on the other hand, seek to provide in every possible way for the safety of human life, and we have inserted provisions which secure that end. They are as follows:

SEC. 14. That no vessel, except those navigating rivers exclusively and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel, unless the crew in each department shall include a sufficient number of seamen who understand the languages of both officers and crew, through whom the orders of the officers may be communicated in a manner to be readily understood by the seamen, in any department, to whom such orders are given. The number of seamen through whom the orders of the officers may be transmitted shall not be less than the number of lifeboats such vessel is required to carry, and at least one of such seamen shall be assigned to each lifeboat.

That is, if she has 10 or 15 or 20 lifeboats there must be at least one for each lifeboat who can communicate the orders between the two.

Mr. POMERENE rose.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have occupied altogether more time than I had anticipated I would, and I know there are others who desire to speak, so I shall hasten on.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask whether the amended bill represents the unanimous views of the committee?

Mr. BURTON. In this particular I think so, with possibly one exception. I should say to my colleague, in frankness, that not all the members were present at all times, but we sought to keep in touch with all of them.

Mr. POMERENE. Are there any objections to the bill so far as concerns those provisions which relate to the comfort and convenience of seamen?

Mr. BURTON. Not at all; certainly not.

Mr. POMERENE. The opposition was largely to the——

Mr. BURTON. It was largely to the section about which I am now speaking.

The Senate committee has inserted a provision here not contained in the House bill, and has struck out that which was in the House bill. The House bill, immediately after the provision which I have read, provides that 40 per cent in the first year after the passage of the bill, 45 per cent in the second year, 50 per cent in the third, 55 per cent in the fourth, and thereafter 65 per cent of the deck crew of the vessel, exclusive of licensed officers, shall be of a rating not less than able seaman, and that no vessel carrying passengers, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have a sufficient crew to man each lifeboat with not less than two men of the rating of able seaman or higher.

This is a provision that it is utterly impracticable to carry out. It would require that there should be two able seamen for every lifeboat. There are lifeboats to the number of 40 on some ships where the crew does not number more than 20, and it would require on each trip the carrying of 60 men in addition to those now carried. It would be impossible, from the list of seamen available, to recruit a sufficient number to comply with this requirement. But, more than that, the committee did not regard this test as one which will insure safety on board ship. The experience of those who took part in the Titanic investigation was that some of the very stupidest men who appeared as witnesses were seamen who had served not only three but four and five years.

We are not ready to recommend to Congress a bill which makes the test of skill in handling a boat and in saving human life the number of years that a man has served on a boat. Instead of that requirement, while wishing to recognize that class and to encourage men to become veterans on board ship, we have provided here in the next section or paragraph on page 37:

No vessel carrying passengers, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have a sufficient number of efficient lifeboat hands, which in no case shall be less than two for each lifeboat that such ship is required to carry, to launch and handle the prescribed lifeboats and life rafts.

That makes it necessary to have at least two for every lifeboat; but we do not say, because a man has been three years on board a boat, when those years may have been years during which his capability has not increased, that he can man one of them. They must be competent boatmen, and they may be supplied from any branch of the service.

I wish to say that everyone who appeared before the committee who took a dispassionate view of this question, who took neither the side of boat owner nor that of seaman, joined in that opinion—that the test of three years' service was neither practicable nor desirable. Much as I should like to see the number of our sailors increase, I do not think this is a practicable way to accomplish it. They are a shifting class; crews change, not only from month to month, but from week to week, and from trip to trip. If the manning of vessels were restricted to this class of seamen, many boats would be tied up much of the year.

Again, it was the unanimous opinion of the masters who appeared before us—and I do not believe they were so governed by prejudice that they would not tell the truth—that many of the brightest men and the best sailors were those who lived around on the shores of bays and of rivers or who came off of farms—healthy, strong, and ambitious young men, who in a few months showed a capability for usefulness on board ship that was oftentimes lacking in those who had served for years.

The House bill defines the regulations, and requires specific tests. Of course this provision would embroil us with practically every country with which we have any trade. It would be saying to them: "We will determine the class of men you shall have to man your boats," and there would have to be a revocation of the treaties, not only in regard to desertion, but in these other respects.

Section 15 of the bill defines a seaman, and says that he may be rated as an able-bodied seaman, which I take it the Members of the Senate know is one who has served three years at sea.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Right there, would not a deck hand on a sailing vessel who had learned to splice ropes and rig sails and do that sort of work for three years be entitled to certification as an able seaman?

Mr. BURTON. I take it he would.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There is no distinction here with reference to whether his service was on a modern steamship, run by machinery, or whether it was on an old-fashioned sailing vessel, as to his being an able-bodied seaman.

Mr. BURTON. No.

On page 39 there is contained the provision which applies to wheelsmen, or quartermasters, and lookout men. Quartermasters are synonymous with wheelsmen. It is provided that they shall be of not less rating than that of an able seaman; but we do not restrict it to three years' service. We put in a provision that a man who has served one year might take an examination, and if he was found fit on that examination he should serve as wheelsman or lookout man. I may suggest to the Senate that at the proper time I shall move to transfer page 39 to page 37, following line 20, because I think it more properly belongs there than in its present position.

Mr. NELSON. To what page?

Mr. BURTON. Page 37, after line 20, so as to bring together there all the provisions in regard to safety, and provide one penalty at the end.

Mr. President, section 16 is one with which I am frank to say I am not altogether satisfied. It seems to me the barge, such as many which are used, is a very dangerous craft in which to go to sea. The House provided that not more than one barge should be towed by any tug unless it was provided with sails or motive power. There was much discussion on this section. It appears that a very large business has grown up in which comparatively small wooden barges are used, drawing when light not more than two and a half or three feet, loading from 400, say, to 1,000 tons. They go from the waters of North Carolina sometimes through Chesapeake Bay and the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal and the Delaware River to Philadelphia. Sometimes they go out on the sea.

I am frank to say that there was no provision in the whole bill as it came from the House that appealed to me more strongly than section 14 of that bill—section 16 of the Senate bill. But it is alleged, on the other hand, that this business has been continued for many years, and that scarcely a life has been lost. Under these representations the committee made a change and inserted this provision:

That the owner, agent, or master of every barge which, while in tow for 50 miles or more through the open sea, has sustained or caused any accident, shall be subject in all respects to the provisions of sections 10, 11, 12, and 13, of chapter 344 of the Statutes at Large, approved June 20, 1874, and the reports therein prescribed shall be transmitted by collectors of customs to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who shall transmit annually to Congress a summary of such reports during the previous fiscal year, together with a brief statement of the action of the department in respect to such accidents.

Provision is made for investigation and report upon it, and goes no further. While I am not altogether satisfied with the form in which it appears in the Senate amendment, such representations were made to the committee that it seemed best to adopt it in this form.

Section 17 is one of the vital portions of this bill. As it is now, if a seaman deserts from a foreign ship in any port of the United States we are obligated by treaties to aid in his arrest and return to the vessel from which he deserted. That has been a feature of treaties and conventions with foreign countries from the very earliest days of this Government. But, Mr. President, I submit that the spectacle of taking a man who desires to leave employment on a merchant vessel and restoring him to that ship and compelling him to engage in a service which he desires to leave is alien to the spirit of our institutions. I do not think we are guilty of any discourtesy toward foreign nations when we say to them that we wish these treaties to be abrogated in so far as they require arrest for desertion—that we do not approve of returning to involuntary service any man who deserts from a merchant ship.

This feature alone in this bill would make it desirable that we should pass it, because it is not only a declaration of our principles but it affords these men relief from what they regard as an invasion of their natural rights. I fully recognize the force of the argument on the other side, namely, that a ship goes from port to port, often touches in a foreign land, and that to desert her is like deserting an army or a warship in time of battle. But in private employment I can not bring myself to believe that this country ought to sanction in any form, or lend its agency, by magistrates or police, to reclaiming those deserters.

We also, of course, abandon the right which we have by treaty for the arrest of seamen deserting from vessels of the United States in foreign countries.

I will read the section, briefly:

That in the judgment of Congress articles in treaties and conventions of the United States, in so far as they provide for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of the United States in foreign countries, and for the arrest and imprisonment of officers and seamen deserting or charged with desertion from merchant vessels of foreign nations in the United States and the Territories and possessions thereof, and for the cooperation, aid, and protection of competent legal authorities in effecting such arrest or imprisonment, ought to be terminated.

Then it provides the method for terminating these treaty provisions, which, of course, must be done diplomatically; but this is an express direction of Congress, a law declaring that we intend to bring to an end this practice of arrest for desertion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator inform me as to whether there are many desertions now, under existing law, from vessels landing in ports of the United States?

Mr. BURTON. I am told that there is no very great number, but that this is regarded by foreign countries as a preventive. It has awakened protest. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is it a regulation or a law that exists generally throughout the nations of the world?

Mr. BURTON. It does, although there are some exceptions to that; but it is the general rule that there may be arrest for desertion. I may say to the Senator from Michigan that as regards our domestic trade we abolished arrest and imprisonment for desertion in 1898.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I know that.

Mr. BURTON. That was an explicit declaration of our policy on the subject.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I have just said to the Senator from Ohio, in an aside, that I understood him to reply to the Senator from Michigan that the amendment of section 4596 of the Revised Statutes still provides for one month's imprisonment.

Mr. BURTON. Only in case the offense is in a foreign port; not in case it is in a domestic port.

Mr. ROOT. So that now we have no arrest or imprisonment for desertion in a domestic port.

Mr. BURTON. We now have no arrest or imprisonment for desertion in a domestic port. If the desertion is in a foreign port, there may be a penalty imposed, at the discretion of the court, of imprisonment for not more than one month.

Mr. ROOT. Does the Senator understand section 4596 of the Revised Statutes to apply only to foreign ports?

Mr. BURTON. That is the law as it now is. The law as it is contained in the Revised Statutes has been modified. I have before me a print of the law as it now is, and I will read it. It prescribes the following penalty for desertion:

If the offense occur at a port of the United States or a foreign port in the domestic trade, by forfeiture of all or any part of the clothes or effects he leaves on board and of all or any part of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned.

If the offense occur at a foreign port in the foreign trade, by forfeiture of all or any part of the clothes or effects he leaves on board and of all or any part of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned, and also, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for not more than one month.

Mr. ROOT. That is the present law?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. May I ask a question of the Senator?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. The change was made in 1898, I understand?

Mr. BURTON. I think so. I am not sure as to the time when we abolished the punishment of imprisonment for desertion when the offense was committed in a domestic port. I think it was in 1898.

Mr. ROOT. That would give time enough for some experience to take place. Did the committee get any light on the subject as to whether taking away the right of arrest and imprisonment in case of desertion of seamen in our home ports has increased desertion or has interfered materially with commerce?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly no one who appeared before the committee argued in favor of the restoration of imprisonment for desertion in the domestic trade.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not to take the time of the Senator from Ohio, but to answer briefly the Senator from New York, I will say that while the desertions prior to the enactment of the law of 1898 were something over 5 per cent, since that time they have been less than 1 per cent.

Mr. BURTON. It was stated by some who appeared before the committee that there had been a considerable number of instances in which the boat had been deserted by her crew, and they had demanded additional wages before they were willing to return.

There is one other paragraph to which I wish to call attention, and that is the one relating to the punishment that is imposed for endeavoring, by force or threat, to prevent a seaman from obeying the order of his captain, and also for endeavoring, by force or threat, to prevent his employment. That is a provision inserted by the Senate committee. It was thought to be fair in view of the peculiar nature of the employment of seamen, the necessity for departing on schedule time, and the very great interests involved in securing promptness in the dispatch of vessels.

Mr. President, the subcommittee submits this bill satisfied, as I said yesterday, that it is a greater advance than any bill and all bills which have been passed for the improvement of the condition of the seaman during the past 30 years. Even if some of these other reforms seem to us salutary it is desirable that in any movement of this kind we shall proceed with a reasonable degree of conservatism, because even if abuses do exist, we can not reform them all at one time without unduly disturbing this great business, which in many localities is now in a languishing state.

I trust that some opponent of the bill will now take the floor.

I will ask the Chair how much time I have occupied.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One hour and forty-six minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it seems to me that some of the lessons that were thought to have been taught by the loss of the Titanic have been forgotten already. If there was one thing which more than another impressed itself upon our minds at that time it was the fact that the loss of life had been due so largely to the inefficiency of the crew and to the fact that there were so few able seamen aboard. In several cases the crew did not even know how to row a boat. So it seemed that while we were making legislation concerning the safety of construction of the ship itself the great thing to be done in the future was to require a sufficient number of able seamen to be able to take care of the ship properly in time of catastrophe.

Immediately after the loss of the Titanic a statement was issued by a number of the survivors, and from it I quote this:

> The insufficiency of lifeboats, rafts, etc.
> The lack of trained seamen to man the same.
> Stokers, etc., are not efficient boat handlers.
> Not enough officers to carry out emergency orders on the bridge, to superintend the launching and control of lifeboats.

Mr. President, in addition to that—although it was not the case on the Titanic—it has been the case in several instances that the crew would not understand the language in which the orders of the officers were issued.

There has been prepared a list of notable marine calamities, to which I will refer.

For example, in the case of the steamship City of Rio de Janeiro, 128 lives were lost. She struck a reef and foundered at the entrance to San Francisco Harbor on February 22, 1901. She had a raw Chinese crew, who devoted their energies to saving themselves, and only three of the one hundred and odd passengers were taken into lifeboats.

There is the case of the steamship Clallam, where 50 lives were lost. She foundered in the Straits of Juan de Fuca January 8, 1904.

There is the case of the steamship Slocum, where 955 lives were lost. With that case we are all well acquainted. It occurred in the harbor of New York in 1904.

There was the case of the Père Marquette, where 27 lives were lost. The vessel foundered in Lake Michigan. Up to within five days of the time she foundered this vessel had been running excursions out of Chicago, carrying 1,500 to 2,000 people daily. Fortunately on the day she foundered she had only three or four passengers on board. Then there is the Titanic that we know all about.

The lesson that impresses itself in all these cases is the absolute inefficiency of the crew, the fact that there was not a sufficient percentage of able seamen to take care of the ship at the proper time. In one of the cases the crew, totally untrained, and Chinamen at that, took possession of all the boats and scuttled the ship and left some 200 and odd passengers, I believe it was, to perish.

Before this bill was amended by the committee it made ample protection and created safeguards and prescribed that there should be a sufficient proportion of able, trained seamen; that there should be at least two able seamen capable of rowing a lifeboat, and various other provisions which have been stricken out by the Senate committee.

I hold in my hand a short analysis of the most objectionable and dangerous clauses of the bill as reported from the Committee on Commerce.

In the first place, subsection 9 of section 8, on page 30 of the bill, provides one year's imprisonment for refusal or willful neglect to engage in boat or fire practice or drill, to efficiently assist in launching the ship's lifeboats. This is unnecessary because the fifth subsection of the same section 8, page 29, provides three months' imprisonment for willful neglect of duty as applied to the individual, and section 5359 of the Revised Statutes, the so-called mutiny section, provides imprisonment up to five years if done collectively.

In port this section would, at the discretion of the master or other ship's officer, interfere with proper rest or with the seamen's right to quit a vessel while in a safe harbor, thus restoring involuntary servitude in the coastwise trade when we have abolished it.

The proviso that no boat or fire drill shall be called for the purpose of preventing men from quitting the service is of no value, because the master or other officer's purpose is something personal to him and known only to him, and the burden of proof would be on the seamen that such was the intent of the master or the officer. This section ought to go out, because it restores just what the bill purports to abolish.

A seaman while at sea can not be replaced, and the common hazard in which every one upon the ship shares demands a prompt obedience of orders, but while in a safe harbor he can be replaced. The proper penalty, therefore, is dismissal, with or without money earned, as provided by the present law.

The committee ought not, as in this case, to go back and restore a part of the involuntary servitude which has been abolished. The loss of the promised job, the necessity for work, and his desire to get work seem to me a sufficient penalty, whether it be so regarded in all other vocations and pursuits or not; and there is no reason why a different rule should be applied when the seaman is in harbor.

Then, in section 12, page 33 of the bill, line 20, the following clause occurs:

> or shall by any threat or force dissuade or prevent or endeavor to dissuade or prevent any person from taking employment on board any vessel, or shall by threat or force dissuade or prevent or endeavor to dissuade or prevent any person from remaining in the service of any vessel, on which he has shipped, and so forth.

Why make a Federal statute of that? The laws of the States prevail within the port. It seems to me that that is unnecessary.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Mississippi will yield to me for a moment, I would say that the precedent for that statute is found in a law punishing the masters passed quite recently:

> Whoever, with intent that any person shall perform service or labor of any kind on board any vessel engaged in trade—
> And so forth—
> shall procure or attempt to procure or induce another by force or threats—
> And so forth.

So that the vessel masters and the owners, notwithstanding that act is on land, are punished under a statute which contains exactly those same words; and it seemed to the committee——

Mr. WILLIAMS. What are the master and owner punished for?

Mr. BURTON. "Whoever by force or threats endeavors to induce anyone to go on board"——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a different thing.

Mr. BURTON. I do not see that it is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is to stop kidnaping. It is to stop involuntary servitude.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is to stop the old press-gang work that had been abused in England and here for very many years.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no. The Senator will notice what follows:

> Induce or attempt to procure another by force or threats, or by representation which he knows or believes to be untrue—
> And so forth—
> to go on board any such vessel or sign or in anywise enter into any agreement to go on board any such vessel to perform service or labor thereon.

The offense is merely inducing a person to enlist, to go on board the vessel. The punishment is quite as severe, and it is under the same circumstances.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, no one is a seaman at all unless he has shipped on a vessel. This provision of the bill as it comes from the committee would substitute the jurisdiction of the United States court for the jurisdiction of the State court over misdemeanors committed within the State jurisdiction by men not seamen or upon men not seamen. The man is not a seaman until he has gone on board, until he has become a part of the ship's crew. You are attempting in this bill to substitute a Federal jurisdiction and authority upon men who have not yet become a part of the merchant marine, for whatsoever disgraceful or criminal thing it may be, it is a thing still punishable by the laws of the State, and which ought to be left to be punished, if at all, by the laws of the State.

In the second place, neither threats nor force as here used are defined. The force may be purely mental and the threat only in the mind of the one who claims to have been threatened. That opens a great door for the espionage class, for detectives and that sort of folk. Nobody would dare to assist a seaman in leaving either a foreign or a domestic vessel because of possible blackmail. Substantially similar laws were on the statute books of several States, and they have been repealed in the States of Massachusetts, California, and Washington. Whether it be wise to repeal them or not, whether it would be wise to reenact them where repealed or not, the fact still remains that it ought to be left to the jurisdiction of the State courts.

It would seem that this would destroy the system of equalization of operating expenses in foreign and American vessels taking cargoes or passengers from American ports.

Before freedom was given to the seamen in the coastwise trade by the act of December 21, 1898, I am informed that more than 5 per cent shipped either failed to join or later deserted the service, and since 1898, when we gave freedom to the sailors in the coastwise trade, the failures to join and the desertions have been reduced to about 1 per cent. The condition of the seamen has improved, and the shipowners are getting better service and the entire merchant marine is more satisfactorily working and more harmoniously working.

Now, Mr. President, section 14, on page 36, destroys the standard of skill in the crew set by the Court of Appeals of the Ninth Judicial District in the case of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., volume 64, page 410, where the court held that the company had forfeited any right of limited liability. Why? Because the crew in that particular case could not understand and execute the orders made necessary as issued by the officers. It has been held well, in consequence of that, to provide that a certain percentage of the crew must be able to understand the language in which the orders are issued.

Section 14 of this bill is reactionary upon that subject. The crew legalized in this committee amendment is exactly the kind of a crew referred to in that case and on board of the steamship City of Rio de Janeiro at the time of its disaster. The provision would not improve safety at sea; it would decrease safety at sea.

Section 15, pages 38, 39, and 40, provides a standard of efficiency by defining able-bodied seamen, but excludes from its operation all freight vessels and all passenger vessels below 300 tons gross and "vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 12 hours."

In other words, they erect a standard of safety and efficiency, and then turn around and exclude from the operation of the standard all freight vessels and all passenger vessels below 300 tons gross, and, what seems to be peculiarly shortsighted, all vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 12 hours.

The Slocum, that went down in New York Harbor, and the ship to which I referred, that went down off Chicago, were ships whose trip did not exceed 12 hours; and so the ship that just happened to go down on a day when it did not have more than three or four passengers, but was in the habit of carrying from a thousand to fifteen hundred passengers every day, was on a route shorter than 12 hours. By what sort of legerdemain, of ratiocination anybody's mind can arrive at the conclusion that a man or a ship making a trip of only 12 hours ought not to have the same protection and safeguard thrown around him as if he were going to take a trip of five weeks, I can not understand.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That clause applies to the three-watch system, where a fireman or a wheelman or a lookout can only be employed on three successive watches during the 24 hours, but if the vessel is running only 12 hours it would be impossible to distribute three watches. That is the exception.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Section 15 provides a standard of efficiency by defining what shall be held to be able-bodied seamen. It exempts from the definition of what shall be held to be able-bodied seamen those on the character of vessels to which I have referred, making that sort of trips.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me? I am sure the Senator from Mississippi wishes to quote this correctly.

In line 14 it speaks of the requirement, but this requirement shall not apply to "vessels of less than 300 gross ton, or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 12 hours." Now, what is this requirement? It is not the part which goes ahead defining what is an ablebodied seaman, but it is the requirement that, while at sea, wheelmen and quartermasters and lookout men shall be divided into at least three watches.

I wish to say to the Senator from Mississippi that as this bill passed the House it did not require three watches for wheelmen nor for lookout men, but only for firemen. The committee bill is better than the bill as passed by the House because it gives the three watches to the wheelmen and to the quartermasters and the lookout men, except that this requirement is not in force where the vessel is only out 12 hours. Am I not correct?

Mr. BURTON. It applies only to passenger vessels.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Only to passenger vessels.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am inclined to think that the Senator is right. I think I made a mistake about that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I simply wish to remark that if the Senator from Mississippi will study the bill carefully he will find that some of his criticisms upon the committee and upon the provisions of the committee's bill are not well taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, now, that is a matter of opinion. Wherever the Senator makes me see an error I will correct it, and if he has not the capacity or the knowledge to make me see it then I shall not correct it, and I shall not correct it because I do not think I ought to correct it. With regard to this particular matter I am inclined to think the Senator is right and that I was mistaken. I thought it referred to the beginning of the section, which says that a seaman shall not be entitled to the rating of A. B., that is to say, of an ablebodied seaman, unless he is at least 18 years of age, possesses a sufficient knowledge of the English language, and so forth.

But I see now that it is reasonable at any rate and probably true that a right construction of it is that it is a limitation only upon the three-watch system. If that is the case, what I said was erroneous.

Now, do not let the Senator criticize me wildly simply because he thinks I may sometimes criticize the bill wildly. This 12-hour provision refers to able seamen. I think it is pretty clear the Senator is right about that and I was wrong.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me a moment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. On page 39, the Senate committee bill goes still further in providing for the wheelmen, quartermasters, and lookout men. There is also a provision as follows:

> That if upon examination, under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce and Labor, as to eyesight, hearing, and physical strength and knowledge of the duties, men found competent may be so employed, although they may have served only one year at sea, and no other men—

That is, whether they have served three years or six years or any time—> than those so qualified shall be employed at the wheel or as lookout.

That is a very decided improvement on the House bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, that expresses, in the main, my objection to the changes made by the committee in this bill. In one sentence it is this, that instead of going forward in the direction in which we face by the act of 1898 they are going backward from it.

I have never had anything revolt me more than the old system of involuntary servitude exerted upon men merely because they chose a seafaring life. When a vessel is at sea it is absolutely necessary that the captain should have arbitrary control of the vessel to the point of having power of life and death at times in order to preserve the safety of the crew and passengers and to put down mutiny and revolt. But the minute the ship gets to land, the minute she gets into the harbor where there is no more common hazard going to the lives of all, where the act of any may destroy all, that moment the involuntary servitude ought to cease and it ought not to be resumed until that man makes himself again a member of the merchant marine by shipping upon a ship.

That is the theory which is in my mind, and it is a theory from which I see no reason to vary in any instance. I do not think it ought ever to be varied from at all. Sometimes the question has been argued from the case of a ship that goes over and lands at a port abroad, and some of the crew desert, and the ship is left without sufficient men to bring the ship home upon schedule time. It is true, every word of it, a hardship. Yes; but it is an equal hardship upon me if I am planting cotton, and in the middle of the season in the crop year a little band of darkies take up and leave and go to work on a railroad or at a sawmill because they can not make any money out of the crop. They leave me in the lurch; it is very true it is a great hardship, but that is no reason why I should hold them in involuntary servitude and make them labor at what they do not want to labor. It seems to me the same principle ought to prevail in connection with this question.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I send to the desk a paper transmitted to me by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York containing the report of the committee on the harbor and shipping of that body. This is an expression from the chamber of commerce of the chief commercial city of the United States. I will ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

Report from the committee on the harbor and shipping of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York in regard to Wilson Seamen's bill (H. R. 23673).

To the Chamber of Commerce:

House of Representatives bill No. 23673, known as the Wilson bill, which has passed the House and is now pending in the United States Senate, is entitled "An act to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports, and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of foreign countries while in the ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen."

Your committee has given serious consideration to this measure, and respectfully reports:

"The well-being of American seamen has always been an object of the chamber's solicitude. Its influence has, from the earliest years, been exerted for their protection and uplift. As early as 1796 it advocated strongly the passage of a law for the protection of sailors, and its records show how often since that time it has exerted all its power to secure for seamen adequate defense against abuses at sea and on land, and provision for care in sickness and old age. By law it elects one of the commissioners entrusted with the duty of licensing and regulating sailors' boarding houses; and one of the most laborious duties imposed upon the chamber's president is that of acting as trustee of Sailors' Snug Harbor. The chamber has always stood for the better protection of life and property at sea, for the more skillful manning of vessels, and for the better training of boys for the trade of seamen.

"It is therefore with no prejudice against the interests of American seamen that your committee on the harbor and shipping has taken up for consideration and report this Wilson bill. On the contrary, so far as the proposed enactment undertakes to justly improve the conditions of seamen, your committee believes it is entitled to support. The bill as drawn, however, would subject owners and masters of American and foreign ships to an 'involuntary servitude' quite as bad as that which it was formerly alleged existed in the case of seamen.

"It is one thing to protect seamen against the tyranny and injustice of an employer. It is quite another thing to give seamen the power to work injustice to their employers, and, if so disposed, actually to tie up the shipping of the world. In the recent report of the arbitrators in the controversy between the railways and the engineers the board, after stating that the balance of power in the control of wages had passed to organized labor, proceeded to show what a calamity would follow a general railroad strike. Your committee believes that an infinitely worse condition would be produced by a change of the balance of power from the shipmaster to the seamen's union. So exposed is the position of a ship at sea and in a foreign port, it is absolutely essential that control should remain with the owner and his agent, the master, and no laws should be enacted that would put him absolutely at the mercy of his crew.

"The commerce of the world would be heavily burdened by such a condition, the costs of conducting business would be greatly increased, and it would impose threatening and onerous conditions which would seriously retard the hope of the revival of an American merchant marine.

"The bill as it passed the House of Representatives would give seamen the right to desert at will, irrespective of the articles they signed on taking service. It can easily be imagined what would happen if a crew deserted in a port where other seamen were not obtainable. Section 12 of the bill provides that no vessel shall depart, etc., unless she shall have specific percentages of able seamen. This would appear reasonable, but the section further provides that in no event shall there be less than two able seamen in the deck department for each lifeboat carried. If it is to be compulsory to employ that number, then many vessels would be compelled to carry many more men designated as able seamen than there would be any reasonable employment for. Seamen of a foreign ship entering the port of New York, whatever the conditions of the articles they have signed, could desert here without penalty.

"This bill not only legalizes desertion but makes it mandatory for masters of ships to pay seamen one-half their wages when they desert, irrespective of any advances that may have been made to the men or their families before sailing from the foreign port. The enactment of this provision would require the abrogation of many treaties which we have made with foreign governments on this subject.

"The bill specifies the qualification of able seamen to be three years' experience at sea or on the Great Lakes, and it provides for the issue of certificates of qualification by local inspectors on the mere affidavits of the applicants, without requiring any investigation or other proof. A great deal will depend upon the character and affiliation of those appointed as inspectors what value and reliability may attach to such certificates. Deserters and men of almost any class may easily, by these means, obtain certificates as able seamen. There is danger that the certificates may get into the hands of sailors' boarding-house keepers for sale, or even be rented for the temporary purpose of obtaining berths. No proper provision is provided for identification, so that substitution and false impersonation could be rife and unchecked.

"It seems to be clear that the intention of these provisions is to create conditions that will make it possible not only for the seamen's union to raise the wages of both American and foreign seamen but also to put the shipowner at the mercy of his own employees in a trade in which discipline is the first essential for the safety of passengers and the regularity of commerce. In fact, the whole bill puts a premium upon desertion and makes articles of agreement not worth the paper upon which they are written.

"Of course, such an enactment would inevitably advance freight rates to cover the higher costs and risks. Consumers the world over would have to pay the bill. But a still greater danger and more threatening commercial condition are involved. The United States in its export trade, particularly in manufactured products, must compete in many markets of the world with the productions of other countries. Shipping engaged in carrying merchandise from United States ports, to cover the hazards and expenses implied in this bill, would have to demand higher rates of freight than shipping performing an equal service in carrying the products of other competing countries direct from their ports to the same consuming markets. There would thus be placed a serious menace and handicap upon the entire export commerce of this country.

"Your committee believes that the bill should be amended so as to preserve what is proper for the protection of seamen, whether organized or not, and at the same time protect our commerce from this additional burden and shipping from this assault upon the well-defined principles which experience has proved necessary for the maintenance of safety and law and order on the seas.

"We therefore offer the following resolutions for adoption:

"'Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York protests against all those provisions in House bill 23673 which would deprive shipowners and shipmasters of adequate power to protect life and property and to navigate the seas without being subject to the perils and losses caused by the domination or desertion of crews and the inability to administer proper discipline; and be it further

"'Resolved, That copies of this report and these resolutions be sent to every Member of the Senate in the hope that final action of that body on this important subject may promote the true interests of American shipping and that the respective rights of both capital and labor may be justly and adequately safeguarded.'"

SERENO S. PRATT, Secretary.

NEW YORK, February 27, 1913.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I have asked that this report of the committee on shipping of the Chamber of Commerce of New York be read, because it expresses the views of gentlemen of great experience at the chief shipping point in the United States, and of gentlemen who have, as they say in the report, long been greatly concerned for the protection and welfare of the sailor.

Many years ago I was myself engaged as district attorney in New York in the enforcement of the laws which we enacted about 40 years ago to protect sailors, and became somewhat familiar with the development of the practice, the procedure, and the decisions by means of which the shipping commissioner was enabled to mitigate the abuses and indeed the horrors of the sailor's life. I wish to say about this bill, with that background of familiarity with the early enforcement of the statutes of this description and of interest in the subject, that I find it full of most valuable provisions. I think I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that it will be a great step in advance. There are, however, two or three observations regarding the provisions of the bill which I think I ought to make.

In the first place, I find that the substitute reported by the Senate committee obviates some of the objections made by the committee of the chamber of commerce, which has been read.

In the second place, I want to call attention to the fact that the provision relating to the termination of obligations in our treaties for the arrest and imprisonment of deserters, coupled with the repeal of the provision for arrest, really ought to be guarded if we are not to open the door to serious abuses in the way of immigration without the restriction afforded by the supervision and the administration of the immigration laws.

The desertion of seamen has already been the means, in many instances, to a very considerable degree of evading the limitations imposed by our immigration laws; and I regret to see all the treaties and statutes under which we now prevent a stream of immigrants coming in who do not comply with the requirements of our immigration act wiped out, without some substitute. I do not know what is to stand in the way of a general Asiatic immigration on the Pacific coast, unless we create some machinery to take the place of the machinery of the immigration bureau for ordinary immigration.

Of course, if it appears that ships can come across the seas with large crews, who are at liberty to desert and are not subject to any inspection or practical restriction, such as they would be subject to if they came in the steerage of a passenger ship, the news will soon spread in China, and the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] will find questions asked him as to why he consented to a statute that left his coast without protection from that kind of immigration.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I do not know why the Senator from New York should single out the Senator from California, in order to influence his vote by what may happen to him if he votes in a certain way upon this bill. I am trying to be informed as to what my duty is, and how I should vote upon this question, and when I have done so, if I ever do, I shall certainly vote my sentiments without respect to any criticism that may come from any source.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from New York wishes to suggest now to the Senator from California the question that will be asked him hereafter. As I think, it is a question we ought to answer now. Opportunities of this kind create abuses. It may be that there is but little evasion of the laws now, but if we open the door wider, and the news spreads abroad that there is the opportunity to come in, I think we may look for very serious evasion of the immigration laws.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from New York yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The case of the open door to which the Senator from New York refers was covered and fully met by the immigration bill which the President vetoed. Provision was therein made covering the case of deserting sailors. If that bill had become a law, it would have covered exactly what the Senator from New York refers to, and the question of the treaty would not have been involved in it.

Mr. ROOT. If such a provision could be put into this bill, it would meet precisely the observations that I am making.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from New York whether the Chinese-exclusion law would not be sufficient to cover most of this class of immigration so far as the Chinese are concerned? I concede that there is a certain amount of danger so far as the immigration of the nonexcluded class is concerned.

Mr. ROOT. Probably, Mr. President, by way of prohibition, yes; but by way of administration, no. A prohibition is of no use unless you have machinery to make it effective. If you destroy your machinery, your prohibition becomes practically a dead letter.

I am not antagonizing this provision, Mr. President. I do not contend that we should apply a different rule to sailors coming in on foreign ships with regard to the enforcement of their contracts from the rule we apply to our own sailors; and as we have abandoned the remedy that long existed for the enforcement of the contracts of sailors upon American ships, I see no reason why we should maintain it as to sailors on foreign ships.

So, I am not combating this provision; but I think we ought to have it guarded, so that there will be some machinery to prevent it being made an evasion of the immigration laws. As the Senator from Minnesota has suggested that there was a clause in the immigration bill which passed the Senate and House, but which failed to become a law, it might be advisable, it seems to me, to put that provision into this bill.

There is one other suggestion I desire to make, and that is as to the amendment of section 4530 of the Revised Statutes. Section 4530 now provides:

SEC. 4530. Every seaman shall be entitled to receive from the master of the vessel to which he belongs one-third part of the wages which shall be due to him at every port where such vessel shall unlade and deliver her cargo before the voyage is ended, unless the contrary be expressly stipulated in the contract.

It is proposed to amend that so that it will read:

SEC. 4530. Every seaman on a vessel of the United States which, prior to the completion of her voyage, shall enter any port for the purpose of loading or delivering cargo shall, upon demand made subsequent to entering such port, be entitled to receive from the master of the vessel to which he belongs, within 48 hours after demand therefor, one-half part of the wages which he shall have earned at said port—and all stipulations of contract to the contrary shall be null and void.

Thus changing it from a third to a half—

Thus cutting out the power of the shipowner to make any different contract with the seaman; so that, instead of the shipowner being obliged to pay the seaman one-third of the wages earned up to the port entered in the course of a voyage, unless otherwise provided by the contract of shipment, the law will be that the shipowner must pay one-half of the wages earned up to the time of entering the intermediate port, and any provision of contract to the contrary is declared to be void.

Sir, it seems to me that that would put us in the position, when taken together with this other legislation, of confusing two entirely different theories of legislation. The old theory regarding seamen was that they were to be regarded in some sense as wards of the Government, entitled to protection and deemed to be under special obligations for the conduct of the voyage for which they shipped. We visited heavy penalties upon those dealing with them, and we imposed upon them under penalty of arrest and imprisonment the obligation to perform their part of the contract. We did not treat them as being altogether sui juris; we protected them against unconscionable contracts, and we required them to perform their part of reasonable contracts. We are now departing from that old view, and we are treating the sailor just as any other person making a contract is treated. We are relieving him from the burden of being required to carry out his contract; of being arrested and taken back to his ship and made to carry it out.

We are treating him just like any independent man in the possession of his senses and of his liberty. That being so, we ought to be consistent and give to the person contracting with him the benefit of the same theory. While we take away from the seaman the pressure of threatened arrest and compulsion to continue his voyage, we ought not at the same time to take away from his employer the right of contract with the seaman, so as to make the ordinary motives that operate upon men in their business transactions induce the sailor to keep his contract.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. What the Senator states is not wholly true, and I say that guardedly.

Mr. ROOT. Yes; the Senator is very mild.

Mr. NELSON. I say it guardedly. Ordinarily, a laboring man has a right to allot his wages in advance. You and I have such a right; we can allot our wages; and so can any laboring man; but in this proposed legislation for the sailors and in the legislation enacted some years ago, in order to eliminate the "crimps," the men who shanghai sailors, we utterly forbade allotments. A sailor now is forbidden to make any allotment except to his wife, his mother, his sister, or his other relatives. Now, we go a step further in this bill. We not only apply it to American ships, as it has been applied heretofore, but we apply it to foreign ships, to the extent that if a foreign ship needs a crew in New York Harbor or in Boston Harbor and that crew is enlisted in this country, then that ship is subject to the same restrictions in reference to allotments as are American ships, because we are unwilling that foreign ships shall have the authority to make use of "crimps" and to shanghai our men on board of foreign vessels.

Mr. ROOT. I agree with the Senator that that ought not to be permitted.

Mr. NELSON. Let me go a step further and point out to the Senator that it often happens that a poor sailor is shipped on a vessel where the mate and the captain are perfect brutes, where the food is poor and the sailors are beaten with belaying pins, and in every other way ill treated, and when the poor devil, if I may use that rather emphatic expression, gets to a foreign port, and, in order to get out of that hell on shipboard, takes his leave, why should he not have that privilege? What can the poor fellow do if he steps ashore in a foreign country and has not a penny in his pocket?

Mr. ROOT. On the other hand, Mr. President, suppose the sailor has not been maltreated, but simply takes it into his head to leave and break his contract? In the case supposed by the Senator from Minnesota the contract has been broken by the master of the ship, and we impose heavy penalties for the conduct which the Senator has described; but suppose, on the other hand, the contract has not been broken by the master; suppose the sailor has been well treated, but simply takes it into his head to break his contract and go off, leaving the ship without the help that is necessary to navigate it to its home port?

Mr. NELSON. The Senator knows that in that case the sailor loses half his pay. That is a stimulus and an inducement for him to remain. A sailor is not going to throw away his right to half of his pay. If he goes on a ship to a foreign port, he is not going to desert his ship and lose half of his pay merely for the fun of the thing. If he deserts at all, it will be because he has been accorded brutal and harsh treatment on board the ship.

Mr. ROOT. It may be because he thinks he can do better for himself than to go on under the contract.

But, Mr. President, I will not take up any more time, because I am advised that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] is to make some remarks, and I do not wish to abbreviate what he has to say.

I do not think, sir, that at the same time when we are reducing the power of the master of the vessel to keep his men to the contract we should take away the right of the employer to make an entire contract with his men and to keep the inducement of that entire contract in order to retain them in the service.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Just upon that point, Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that the people interested were before the committee and were frequently heard on various phases of the bill, but I do not remember a single objection being raised to that particular provision by those representing our coastwise shipping——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the Senator heard, I presume, the paper which was read at the desk from the Chamber of Commerce of New York.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Except as I heard it from the paper of the New York Chamber of Commerce, which has been read. Gentlemen representing directly the shipping interests appeared before the committee—and we have held hearings almost constantly since last December—and that communication from the Chamber of Commerce of New York is the first I have heard directly of any opposition to that particular phase of the bill.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota pardon me for just a moment?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I had no intention of taking up any time in the discussion of this bill or of taking any part in the debate. I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject matter of the bill to undertake to discuss it upon its merits. I would not say a word now except for what has been said by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] relating particularly to my own State.

It has been intimated by the Senator from New York that if I should take a certain course with respect to this bill I might be called upon to answer embarrassing questions put to me by the people of California. I have never allowed myself to be intimidated from doing what seemed to me to be my duty by what anybody may say or do in the future, and I hope I will not do so now.

With respect to the coming of Chinese into California——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, did I have the floor or not? Time is very important in this discussion, if I am going to discuss the bill at all. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. WORKS. I am only to going to say a few words, if the Senator will allow me; and I desire to do so now in this direct connection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator knows that the time has been divided, and I think the half belonging to the proponents of the bill is practically exhausted now. I do not know whether the Senator is for or against the bill, but if we are to have a further word to say, we have got to have it now or probably not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota has the floor.

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator objects to giving me a few moments, I will not proceed further.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am only stating the situation to the Senator; that is all.

Mr. WORKS. I will say that after I hear the Senator from South Dakota, if he is so anxious to talk about it, I may be convinced to vote his way.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think the Senator from California misunderstands me. The proponents of the bill and the subcommittee who have had it in charge were allowed one-half of the time. I should like to inquire of the Chair whether that half of the time has been consumed. If it has been, I certainly will yield the floor.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I think in counting the time the remarks of the Senator from New York can hardly be regarded as in favor of the bill. He criticized its provisions. He seems to be an opponent of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has been given a very difficult task. The time was divided equally between the two sides, and yet there was no means provided whereby the Chair could decide which side a Senator might be on, unless he was pronounced in his views. If the time that the Senator from New York has taken should be not charged to either side, then it would be necessary to make a new calculation. It is difficult for the Chair to do that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the time consumed by the Senator from New York might be divided equally, partly for the bill and partly against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has thought of that solution, but it has not yet been proposed. Perhaps that would solve the problem.

Mr. FLETCHER. I make that suggestion, then.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I will apply it to my own case, for instance. Generally, I am for the bill. There are parts of it that I think should not prevail. There are certain amendments that will be offered, which I hope will be adopted. When I offer an amendment, which I intend to do, and speak for it, am I to be reckoned for the bill or against it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to decide that matter with any degree of definiteness at this time. The Chair anticipated the very trouble that has arisen, and at the beginning of the debate was inclined to raise the question, but was advised not to do it, and the discussion has drifted as it has. If the Chair may take the liberty of suggesting it, the time need not be counted out of either side.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is bound to be counted on one side or the other, because we must vote at 8 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be divided.

Mr. CRAWFORD. We are obliged to vote at 8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes. The Chair had in mind to propound this inquiry to the Senate:

The closing words of the agreement are:

> The time for debate to be divided equally between the proponents and the opponents of the bill.

The Chair does not recall any former instance when a provision of that kind was inserted in a unanimous-consent agreement in the Senate. In the other House it is a common practice to agree to an equal division of time, and those who are to control the time are named. No such provision is inserted in the present agreement. The Chair thinks it desirable that that should be done before the debate proceeds.

Can the Senator from Ohio inform the Chair on the point raised? It will be seen that it is an extremely difficult matter for the Chair to determine whether a Senator is on one side or the other, when perhaps he is in favor of some provisions of the House bill and is opposed to other provisions of it.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I was not present when the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into. I should like to inquire whether it included the agreement that certain individual Senators were to consume the time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It did not.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, with reference to the Senator from California, I would not under any circumstances knowingly be guilty of a discourtesy to him. I thought I had the floor in my own right, and that the time was limited. I think the Senator feels as though it was hardly fair to him; and rather than have my good friend feel that way, I will certainly yield the floor.

Mr. WORKS. Oh, no; I do not feel for a moment that the Senator from South Dakota intended to be discourteous to me, and I shall not take up any of his time under the circumstances.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Just for a moment, Mr. President, I should like to give a little statement of what has been done in an attempt to shape up the claims for legislation that were presented to the Subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce.

This matter, it is true, as was said here last evening, came up on the arrival of the bill from the House at the last session. In December the subcommittee began giving hearings upon the bill, and continued almost daily during the entire session up to the time it was reported the other day.

As is generally the case with legislation of this kind, here were the two opposing interests, the representatives of the seamen on the one side and the owners of the great shipping interests on the other. It is practically impossible for men who want to act as legislators to give, in all cases, to each of the parties whose interests conflict somewhat, all they ask and everything they think they ought to have.

I knew very little, I admit, about this subject, and I do not claim to know very much about it yet. But after all of the hearings, the testimony, and the claims I am bound to say that I think in the main this bill as it is before the Senate to-day expresses fairly and justly the general attitude which I think the Congress of the United States, upon deliberation and with full information, would naturally take upon a question of this kind.

For instance, the first claim that was made was with reference to imprisonment and flogging and unjust treatment of sailors at sea. We have gone so far as practically to remove every complaint that can be made upon that score, except in this one single instance: The provision for the payment of the half wage due in the American port is not extended to the sailor and his contract where the vessel is a foreign vessel and the sailor is a foreign sailor and the owner is a foreign owner.

The half wage that the American sailor might get in such a case is not allowed to the foreign sailor. It seems to me that for us to undertake to go aboard a foreign ship and interfere with the contracts between the foreign shipowner and the foreign sailor is not only to violate treaties, but it is to go into a domain which we may have the power to invade, but which, as a matter of wisdom in our relations with foreign nations, we ought not to invade.

With reference to the treatment of these sailors in their sanitary surroundings aboard ship we not only have given them all they asked and all that was given them in the House bill, but we have given them still more. For instance, in the number of cubic feet of air space about their sleeping compartments, in all those provisions that will make life more inviting and more comfortable aboard ships in the way of sanitary surroundings, this bill gives them all and even more than they contended for.

With reference to the hours of labor—and that was one of the serious complaints made by the seamen, and one of the points bitterly contested by the shipowners—the firemen in the engine rooms, not only on the Lakes but in these vessels everywhere, are given the three-watch system—that is, it is provided that they shall have three successive watches, and that their time shall be divided so that they shall get a proper amount of rest. They were here from the coast, they were here from the Lakes, and their demands in that respect have gone into this bill.

With reference to the lifeboat drill—and that is a subject of discussion here—I want simply to leave this thought with the Senate:

When you are treating of a question like efficiency in lifeboat drill, it is not what the sailors may desire in regard to it that should govern; it is not what the shipowners may desire in regard to it that should govern. The principal purpose of this provision is to protect the men whose lives are intrusted to these sailors and to these shipowners. The motive power of this provision for the boat drill, and for the class of men who must be employed to have charge of the boat drill, is the conservation of the lives of the men and the women and the children who go aboard these ships.

If our friends, the sailors, had their way, they would simply put in the provision that was in the House—that there should be two able-bodied seamen, as they call them, for each of these lifeboats. Would that add to the protection of human life? What is the able-bodied seaman under this definition? The man who has been three years on the decks at sea and who has gotten a certificate from some authority that he has put in so much time. That time might have been put in on a sailing craft. He might be an able-bodied seaman within every element of the definition required there; he might to able to handle sails; he might be able to splice ropes; he might be able to manage a sailing vessel and come within that definition, and yet he might know practically nothing about handling a lifeboat on a great modern steamship like the Titanic, so different from a sailing ship. His rating as an able seaman there might not give him the qualifications necessary for handling a lifeboat, for the protection of the lives of the men and women and children aboard these great modern steamers.

So we created the position of lifeboat man in this act, and provided what he should be, and what the test of his efficiency should be, and required that at least two such lifeboat men should be assigned to every boat on every one of these vessels. We provided that he should be an able-bodied seaman, but we provided that he should be more than that. He is required to be a man who, by practical test, has shown that he knows how to hoist and put out and lower the lifeboats on these great vessels. Then we have this provision in here requiring these men to obey the orders requiring lifeboat drills, so that they may not only be efficient and skillful, but they may have the matter in hand all the time.

Mr. President, these boats are in port sometimes for a considerable period. Because we believe we ought to do it in the interest of the men and women and children whose lives are intrusted to their care, we say they shall have these lifeboat drills while the ship is in port as well as while she is at sea. If they are to have these lifeboat drills in port, there must be some provision that some one shall require them to have these drills, and there must be some penalty prescribed if they refuse to take part in them.

Whether we have made the penalty too severe or not is a matter for the Senate to determine. I am sure no member of the committee is opinionated upon that matter. No member of the committee feels that he has spoken the last word as to whether the offense should be mutiny, misdemeanor, or whether there should be a milder punishment than the one that is defined there. But we do submit to the Senate that there should be some provision of that character which would make it the duty of these lifeboat men when in port to take part in these lifeboat drills, and impose some penalty upon them if they refuse to do it. How much of a penalty it should be, let the Senate decide.

With reference to the language test, as the bill came over here from the House it provided that 75 per cent of the crew on these ships shall understand the language of the officers; that is, when the officer gives his order 75 per cent of these sailors must understand the order in the language of the officer giving it. But the testimony was overwhelming, and certainly can not be contested, that if we should undertake to enforce that provision we would not have an American flag on a single vessel on the sea.

What is that provision put there for? If it has a right to be in there, it rests upon the fact that it is necessary to have some provision of that kind in order to protect the lives of passengers on board these vessels in case of accident, because the men in the crews do not understand the orders.

What have we provided? We have provided that on these vessels, in case the sailors do not speak the same language as the officers, there shall be at least one man for every lifeboat who can understand the language of the officers giving the orders, and who can transmit them to the crew.

If the purpose of the provision is to have the crew understand the orders, there is a provision that amply and completely does it, and yet does not drive the American flag off the ocean and make it impossible to secure crews that can be employed under the American flag. If the purpose is not simply to conserve human life, but to undertake by law to put the American aboard ship, that is a different thing. But, Mr. President, when we come to hear all this testimony, we find that there are a good many difficulties in the way of putting the American laboring man on board one of these ships. If good surroundings, good sanitary conditions, a healthful place to sleep, and the three-watch system will do it, I hope they may go there. But, sir, the American plowboy does not go to sea. The ambitious American boy, with these great hives of industry around him, with opportunities to get positions and climb to a higher estate in his own country, does not go to sea, and you can not put him aboard these ships by passing a law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; but I have talked longer now than I intended to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I shall not detain the Senator except to make one observation.

Unless the calling of the sailor can be dignified and put upon a basis which will encourage efficiency and devotion to that calling, we shall not have American sailors.

Much that has been done in this bill is calculated to make life on shipboard much more attractive than it ever has been before. But so long as we permit the recruiting of men to man these great vessels from among the unskilled and the unemployed of the great cities, we menace the calling of the sailor, and in that respect he will be discouraged, and other employments will appeal to him much more strongly than the calling which he would naturally follow.

I want to see this bill so framed, if it is possible to do it, that the personnel of the vessels of the ocean and of the Lakes may rise to that standard of efficiency which will guarantee to those who travel upon the sea, and to those who work in that calling, the greatest safety from the ordinary perils of the sea that it is possible for us to attain.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I am not at war with a single utterance of the Senator. I say that in this bill, where they have had no watch system, or the two-watch system, we have given them the three-watch system. In this bill, instead of their being entirely unregulated and running wild with reference to sanitary surroundings, we have given them the most complete specifications of what shall be required to make life comfortable aboard these vessels that have ever been put into any statute anywhere.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I agree entirely with the statement of the Senator from South Dakota. I think you have put into this bill principles that do you great credit and that ought to be enacted into law.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, they told us stories about men being brought up out of the hot engine room when the decks were covered with ice, when death was almost sure to follow the exposure there. I hope this legislation will be enacted. If it is, nothing of that kind can ever occur again, because we will have the three-watch system for the firemen, and we will have that system for the men who are performing the duties of the lookout and the quartermaster and the wheelsman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to again interrupt the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do; but I want to close in a few moments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because of my physical condition, which for several days has not been what I had hoped it would be, I shall not be able to take part to any extent in the discussion. Indeed, I somewhat doubt the wisdom of my presence in the Chamber. But the importance of the subject is so great, and the care and attention of the subcommittee has been so constant, that I should be very reluctant to criticize a single feature of the proposed substitute.

I think we should have more skilled men on these vessels than the substitute provides for. I think we should make it impossible, in case of an accident or catastrophe, to have lifeboats manned by men so unskilled that they would admit to those whom they were attempting to save that they had never handled an oar and did not even know what the oarlock was for. I should like to see a standard of skill prescribed by this law, and then I would oblige the shipowner to put on his vessel a sufficient complement of that class of skilled seamen to fully protect the vessel, the crew, and the passengers. To that end I hope this discussion as it runs along, and the amendments as they are considered, may have in view increasing the recognized skill which comes from experience and training and determination to guarantee that standard of efficiency which both the Senator from South Dakota and myself sincerely desire.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, again I agree with the Senator from Michigan; and I call attention to the fact that under the law as it exists now there is no provision for the lifeboat drill and the number of men who shall be assigned to each lifeboat such as this bill provides. Here we say:

No vessel carrying passengers, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have a sufficient number of efficient lifeboat hands, which in no case shall be less than two for each lifeboat that such ship is required to carry, to launch and handle the prescribed lifeboats and life rafts.

A seaman shall be entitled to the rating of efficient lifeboat hand who has shown by practical tests to the satisfaction of the master that he is qualified to perform any duty required in the launching and handling of lifeboats and life rafts and their equipment, including the stowing of passengers, swinging out, lowering, detaching and hoisting, and use of oars. Such tests shall be subject to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who shall, through collectors of customs, local inspectors, and other officers of the Government enforce the laws and regulations for the handling of lifeboats and life rafts and the efficiency of lifeboat hands.

As this bill came from the House it had no such provision as that. As it came from the House it defined an able seamen, and it provided that each lifeboat must have an able seaman. But, Mr. President, a man could qualify as an able seaman who perhaps had never handled a lifeboat in his life. At any rate, if he had served on a sailing vessel and could splice ropes and tie sailors' knots and handle a sail, although that occupation is now practically obsolete, he could get a place on one of the modern steamers, where thousands of human lives would be intrusted to his hands, and not be able to comply with the provisions of this law with reference to the handling of lifeboats. Yet we are criticized, and we are accused of having done something wrong, because we require especial training and especial fitness for the handling of lifeboats and require two such men for every lifeboat on board the vessel.

Mr. President, we go further than requiring two of these lifeboat men for every lifeboat; we define the able seamen practically as they were defined in the House bill, or, at least, as the seamen themselves ask that they be defined. Then we provide that there must be employed as lookouts, as quartermasters, and as wheelsmen on every one of these ships men who can qualify thus as able seamen. Then we go further than the House, and for every one of these able seamen put in these positions we give them the three-watch system.

I think this bill is not perfect, but I think it was the honest result of an honest attempt to be legislators and not partisans. It would not be fair to the people of the United States simply to crystallize the wish of one class of men into a statute without putting that wish in right relation to the responsibility and duty we owe to the people whose lives are intrusted to these vessels and to the continuance of commerce itself. We have got to consider those elements as well as the interests of a particular class.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I never knew in my life a more interesting man than the representative of the seamen, who has worked with singleness of purpose and in a self-sacrificing spirit for what he thinks ought to be in this law. Yet I can not agree with him in all things. I think in some respects he wants more than we ought to put into the statute when we are weighing its relation to the people of the United States and the continuance of a great commercial policy in this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the friends of the bill is exhausted.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I favor the bill, but I do not propose to discuss it. I merely wish to explain an amendment which I will offer at the proper time.

From the passage of the act of December 21, 1898, down to 1908 I understand the transportation of sick seamen was defrayed from the fund for the maintenance and the transportation of destitute seamen. By a decision in the Treasury Department it has been held that unless the captain appears personally the consul is not authorized to expend money from that fund for the care of a seaman in a hospital or for his transportation to his home. It is impossible in many cases for the captain to make that personal appearance. A vessel is on the coast of Labrador fishing. It sends a sick seaman by a returning vessel to St. Johns or to North Sidney. He can not be taken in charge under this decision of the department.

I have an amendment which will cure that evil and enable the captain by letter or by telegraph or telephone to inform the consul that the seaman is discharged on account of illness, and secure for him the benefit of the fund, as was intended by the act of 1898.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Chair. Did I understand the Chair to state that those who are in favor of the bill as reported to the Senate have no further time? I wanted to submit a very few remarks on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time has been fully exhausted.

Mr. BURTON. I recognize the great difficulty in making such a computation. I should like to ask how the time of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] was computed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time occupied by the Senator from New York was divided.

Mr. BURTON. I regret that members of the committee are not able to address the Senate upon the question now before us. The Presiding Officer rules that the time of those advocating the bill has been exhausted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By dividing the time of the Senator from New York equally between the two sides the time has been exhausted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my attitude toward this bill is one of general concurrence coupled with a very great desire that it shall be amended in some respects before it is passed. At the proper time I intend to offer an amendment to strike out subdivision 9, of section 8, and in order that Senators who are here may understand the scope and purpose of the amendment and what it will accomplish, I will read that part of the amendment of the committee which I think should be stricken out:

Ninth. For each refusal or willful neglect to engage in boat or fire practice or drill, and for each refusal when engaged in boat drill, and so directed by the master, to efficiently assist in launching the ship's lifeboats the seaman shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year and by forfeiture of all wages earned: Provided, That no boat or fire drill shall be called for the purpose of preventing the men from quitting the service. The provisions of this section shall apply to all merchant vessels of the United States.

I want to impress upon Senators present two or three preliminary observations. First, this section and the provisions that I have just read apply to all merchant vessels of the United States, large or small, passenger boats or freight boats. These provisions apply to all those vessels, whether they are at sea or in port. No matter how long they may be in port, nevertheless these provisions apply.

My criticism of this part of the bill is that it is a practical return to the involuntary servitude which has been so frequently mentioned here, and never mentioned without reprobation. I can not understand just why the committee thought it necessary to go to the extreme length that is embraced in this part of the bill. Remember again that it applies to every boat, great or small, and no matter in what service that boat may be engaged.

In my opinion it will be found to be the ready instrumentality for the coercion of every seaman by criminal penalties in every port of the United States as well as every port of the world in which a merchant vessel of the United States may find itself. I desire to analyze it for a moment:

For each refusal or willful neglect to engage in boat or fire practice or drill.

But before I comment upon just what those words mean, allow me to say that every man must sympathize with every reasonable effort to increase the safety of vessels at sea, to secure the safety of men, women, and children, as the Senator from South Dakota said, who travel upon those boats. But this provision will not accomplish the purpose. In my judgment this provision will defeat itself, first, in rendering the occupation so unattractive and so forbidding and so revolting, if I may use that word, that instead of lifting up the standard of seamanship in this country it will have the distinct tendency to degrade and to lower it. What self-respecting man would be willing to enter into employment of this character under the penalties of this bill?

If it simply provided that at a given time, with a boat crew in the presence of a master, a drill should be ordered, and if a seaman refused to obey the order he might be punished as a criminal, I would make no great objection to it. That, however, is not its meaning. That will not be the scope of its operation.

Mr. BURTON. That is exactly the meaning. It is not supposed that drills would be indulged in that were superfluous. Indeed, the whole subject is under the supervision of the inspectors. I do not know how frequently these drills are held. There is a certain amount of practice, however, that can be obtained in port much more readily than outside. I am really at a loss to understand how the Senator from Iowa places upon it the interpretation which he gives to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no other interpretation to be placed upon it.

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator from Iowa think that boat drills would be ordered by the officers just as a mere means of keeping the men busy, or something of that kind, and not for the sake of giving them the requisite skill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no; the Senator from Ohio utterly misunderstands me. We will assume that a boat is in port. I care not how severe the regulations are made for a boat at sea, for there the rules are, and ought to be, very different from the rules which should govern the crew when the boat is in harbor. But suppose a boat is in port and the master calls out the men for practice; if any man there subject to his order declines to obey the order, I would have no objection to his punishment. But suppose that before the boat reaches port the master publishes an order that every day at 12 o'clock there shall be a boat drill or a fire drill, and that then some of the seamen having shore leave do not return to engage in the boat drill, or suppose some one of the seamen prefers to leave the service at that time or that place, this punishment would be inflicted upon him nevertheless, because it would be on his part a refusal to engage in that drill. It would be on his part a willful neglect to return to the boat for the purpose of complying with the regulations that might be prescribed in advance.

In that way you have in this bill made criminal a less offense than the offense of desertion. The civilization of the time, the common voice of humanity required the United States to take away the criminal punishment from desertion so far as our own coastwise trade is concerned. Yet for the failure to appear at the proper moment, in order to engage in a prearranged or preordered drill, you impose a criminal punishment upon the man. In my opinion, to attempt to enlist men and hold them under those circumstances and visit a penalty is simply to perpetuate the servitude that you are attempting to remove.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). The Senator from Washington makes the point that no quorum is present.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Washington withhold that for a minute?

Mr. POINDEXTER. For a moment.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Iowa is supposing an instance that never occurred in the history of shipping and that could not occur. That would cause the inspectors to call the master down immediately and possibly revoke his license.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is very little use, so far as the discussion of this question is concerned, to discuss it unless there are Senators present to hear the discussion. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Sheppard
Bankhead	Clarke, Ark.	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bourne	Crane	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Crawford	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Cummins	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Dixon	Oliver	Stone
Bryan	Fletcher	Page	Swanson
Burnham	Foster	Percy	Thomas
Burton	Gallinger	Perkins	Tillman
Catron	Gronna	Pittman	Watson
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Poindexter	Webb
Clapp	Jones	Pomerene	Wetmore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. CUMMINS. The penalty that I have just mentioned as following the refusal or neglect of a seaman to engage in a boat or fire drill would be severe enough, indeed too severe, if this part of the section were applicable only to passenger boats of large capacity; but it is applicable to all boats, and to me the breadth of its application in that respect is very significant.

I do not see why seamen when they are in port should not be treated as ordinary human beings. Who would think of imposing a penalty of this sort upon any other kind of employees engaged in any other business whatsoever? We all understand that there must be a distinction when the vessel is at sea, for there are reasons which arise for increased severity under those circumstances; but to say that a seaman in port, under the construction that I have given to this paragraph, must be present at a drill or suffer one year's punishment in jail and forfeit all his wages, impresses me as a violation of the Constitution of the United States. I think it is a cruel and inhuman punishment for that offense. The history of mankind shows that you can not increase the efficiency of law by attaching penalties for violations disproportionate to the offense for which the punishment is inflicted. It is just so here; you could not successfully imprison men a year and forfeit all their wages because while in port they did not attend every fire drill or boat drill that may have been ordered by the master.

In my opinion it would be vastly better if the rule with regard to fire drills and boat drills were imposed upon the ship, leaving the master of the ship to secure obedience to it and compliance with it in the way in which men ordinarily secure compliance with such regulations.

I would as soon think of saying that a brakeman who did not respond in the morning when called to take his train should be sent to the penitentiary for a year and forfeit all his wages as to say that a seaman who might not, for one reason or another, respond to an order of this kind should suffer such a punishment.

But that is not all. The next provision says:

> And for each refusal when engaged in boat drill, and so directed by the master, to efficiently assist in launching the ship's lifeboats.

If my distinguished friends from Massachusetts and New York were here they would be horrified to observe that the committee has employed the split infinitive. To them that is a greater offense, I am sure, than the desertion of a boat drill or a fire drill. It, however, does not concern me. I do not care just where the word "efficiently" is placed, but I should like to know of the Senator from Ohio who is to determine whether the assistance given is efficient or not? Is a man to go to the penitentiary because some court holds that he has not efficiently assisted in launching a lifeboat?

Mr. BURTON. Of course, Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa absolutely misapprehends the general purport of this provision. If I thought or the committee thought for a minute that it was going to impose any hardship on the seamen, that it was going to be used as an instrument of oppression, I would not be for it for a minute. But in order to secure efficiency in the handling of lifeboats there must be certain drills in the harbor. I take it that if a sailor at sea refused to take part in a boat drill it would be considered mutiny.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. As a part of his education and for the handling of lifeboats he should have practice in the harbor as well as at sea.

Now, as regards efficiently assisting, the meaning of that is that he shall give earnest and efficient efforts in his assistance. No court would find him guilty unless it was shown that he was intentionally inattentive—that is, if the seaman acts as if he were making a lark or a mockery of the service, that is not efficient assistance. It is expected that he will go at this seriously, with a view of making himself proficient.

The Senator from Iowa will recognize that certainly since the Titanic disaster there is no one subject concerning safety at sea that has awakened more attention than the necessity for skill in the handling of lifeboats; and the committee, without imposing any hardship on the seaman of punishment—much less than would be the case if he refused any practice at sea—thought this provision should be made. He would be punished much more severely than this at sea. We recognized the necessity for practice in the harbor. We did not feel that we were doing our duty unless we did this. I certainly would not want it to go in if it is going to impose any hardship on seamen or make it possible for a master to use it as an instrument of oppression.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want the Senator from Ohio to know that I am not accusing him of any hardness of heart toward the seaman, but I think if he is responsible for this paragraph he has fallen into an unfortunate error.

There are many things here that do alleviate the condition of the seaman, that are intended for his benefit, and that will result in his benefit; and therefore I was the more surprised to find this provision which seemed to me so cruel and so unnecessary.

The Senator from Ohio will know, I hope—I am sure other Senators will know—that I am not arguing against boat drills in harbor or fire drills in harbor. I think both are necessary and both ought to be required. But I am insisting that it is unnecessary and inhuman to punish a man by imprisonment in the penitentiary a year because he refused or failed to answer to a fire drill or a boat drill. The service there is of no greater importance than the service of a thousand other industries in which we depend upon the honor of mankind, the honor of employees, the standard of character of the employees for the fulfillment of the duties of the master to the public. We are intending here, if possible, to raise the standard of seamen, to invite men of better capacity and of a higher sense of responsibility into the service. The way to get them into the service is not to degrade them before they enter the service by subjecting them to a punishment of this sort for offenses which are common enough in this world of ours.

Mr. BURTON. I did not wish to take quite so much of the time of the Senator from Iowa, but I should like to ask one further question. The Senator from Iowa concedes that boat drills in the harbor are not only desirable, but necessary. They are just as necessary, I take it he will concede more necessary, than boat drills at sea.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not concede that; but I concede that they are necessary.

Mr. BURTON. Are you going to leave the refusal to take part in a boat drill absolutely without any punishment or penalty? Other acts that would be far less serious in the way of insubordination receive punishment.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have a fire department in Washington, which is just as necessary to the safety of Washington as are fire appliances necessary to the safety of boats. Suppose that you should pass a law for the District of Columbia that if any fireman refused to appear or failed to appear at a fire drill, he should be put in the penitentiary for a year, how do you think it would strike the civilized sense of mankind?

Mr. BURTON. That is altogether a different case. In the first place, you have the right to discipline the fireman; he holds a permanent position, and you can discharge him.

Mr. CUMMINS. So you can here.

Mr. BURTON. But if the fire department of Washington could not be made efficient in any other way except by imposing a penalty, the people of Washington would demand, in order to protect themselves from fire, that such refusal to drill should be severely punished.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio begs the whole question. He says if it could not be made efficient in any other way. I say it can be made efficient in another way. We have never tried anything of the sort; it is new and it is unknown to the law of this or any other country, I fancy, although I do not speak advisedly about other countries.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that if the firemen in the service of the city of Washington were required to undergo an examination that should be a test of their efficiency before they were admitted to the service they might not be required to take this drill which is suggested by the illustration offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I was attempting a few moments ago——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a word further. The standard of efficiency provided by the House bill has been eliminated from the Senate bill, and instead they are clothing the masters and the owners of vessels with power to continue in involuntary servitude the seaman.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I was suggesting to the Senator from Ohio a little while ago, the whole purpose of this bill originally was to induce better men, more competent and more efficient men, to enter the service, in the hope, in the confident belief that they would be moved by those sentiments which require men to be true and faithful to their duty and to be constant to their obligations; and, as the Senator from Wisconsin has stated, instead of prescribing standards of entrance, so that none but men of character and conscience could enter the service, all men are invited, apparently, into the service. Then they are sought to be rendered obedient by prescribing such punishment as has never yet been imposed for such an offense, so far as I know.

I am sure that the humane instincts of the Senator from Ohio will lead him to insist upon either the elimination of this provision from the bill or its reformation in such a way as that the consequences I have pointed out may not ensue. In my opinion, all the good that is sought to be attained by this bill would be neutralized and overcome if this blot upon the legislation of a free country should be permitted to remain upon the measure.

The punishment here does not fit the offense; and, if we pass this bill, it seems to me that we indicate not a progress toward higher and better things, not a progress toward the humanities, but rather a retrocession into the gloom of barbarism.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to ask a vote upon the amendment at this time. I think it ought to be fully debated, but I shall offer the amendment when the moment comes at which amendments become appropriate.

I will say, further, that if the Senate should conclude not to adopt the amendment, should conclude to leave this extraordinary provision in the bill, then I shall ask, at least, that its application be limited to boats at sea.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President I do not know that I care to address any criticisms that I may have to make of the bill reported by the Senate committee merely to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There appear to be at this present moment, with myself and the Presiding Officer, 13 Members of the Senate present.

Mr. DIXON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We are discussing, Mr. President, a very important piece of legislation that will be tested by many roll calls, and those roll calls will be presented in many States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crawford	Kern	Sheppard
Brady	Cummins	La Follette	Simmons
Bryan	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Burnham	Fletcher	Myers	Smith, Md.
Burton	Gronna	Newlands	Swanson
Catron	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Thomas
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Page	Watson
Chilton	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Pittman	Williams
Crane	Kenyon	Pomerene

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names—not a quorum. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the roll of absent Senators, and Mr. STONE, Mr. WORKS, Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. BOURNE, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. CURTIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, 48 Senators have answered to their names, but a quorum is not present. I invite the attention of visitors in the galleries from nearly every State in the Union to the fact that important subjects are under discussion in the United States Senate and that Senators enter this body and answer to the roll call and depart from the Senate Chamber immediately thereafter; so that if one is to argue out any of the propositions that are presented on proposed legislation, he must from time to time discuss them with barely a handful of Senators present. I do not propose on this important legislation, on which is dependent the emancipation of the last vestige of slavery on American soil, to discuss it for one moment in the presence of a handful of Senators. Senators can either return to the Senate Chamber, answer to their names, and remain here while these important propositions are being discussed, or they can come in and vote on them without discussion, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. The suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin certainly leaves the road open to make some discrimination. There are some of us who stay here all the time. Having invited the attention of the country to the fact that many are not here, there ought to be some way by which those of us who are here can be protected with our constituencies.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is open to the Senator from West Virginia to state the fact that Senators from various States are present at this time.

Mr. CHILTON. Having answered for myself, I will not undertake to do more.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not propose to go on with the debate at this time. The vote can come at once, and without debate, upon this bill and the amendments which I shall offer, unless Senators return to the Chamber and remain here while those amendments and the bill in its entirety are discussed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if it is in order, I desire to say that my distinguished colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is very assiduous in his attendance upon the sessions of the Senate. As Senators will remember, he attended the session to a late hour this morning, and is unavoidably absent this evening. He has a slight indisposition, but he is nevertheless in attendance upon public business. I wish the RECORD to show that fact.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Are the proceedings from now until the disposition of the bill to be concluded without debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the unanimous-consent agreement to provide that when the voting begins it shall proceed without debate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I call for the yeas and nays upon my amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest that the unanimous-consent agreement be read to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2.30 a. m., March 2, 1913, the Senate will vote, without further debate, upon the motion to agree to the conference report upon H. R. 28180—the rivers and harbors bill—and, further, that at not later than 8 o'clock p. m., on said day, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, and amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 23673—the seamen's bill, so called—through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, the time for debate to be divided equally between the proponents and opponents of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, there is a very light attendance here, and I again suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Simmons
Bankhead	Cummins	La Follette	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Brady	Dixon	Myers	Stone
Bryan	Fall	O'Gorman	Thomas
Burnham	Fletcher	Oliver	Warren
Burton	Gallinger	Page	Watson
Catron	Hitchcock	Perkins	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Pittman	Williams
Chilton	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Works
Clapp	Jones	Sheppard

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 43 Senators have answered to their names—not a quorum. The names of the absentees will be called.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees, and Mr. NELSON, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. KERN, and Mr. GARDNER entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment which will be stated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Inasmuch as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has certain amendments that apply to earlier parts of the bill, I desire to withhold the amendment I have just offered until that part of the bill is reached in regular order.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, do I understand that amendments are now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in Committee of the Whole, and the question is upon the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BURTON. I offer an amendment, to add at the end of page 31 the words "owner of." There is an error in the print at that point which should be corrected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I believe that under the insistent objections of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] the time was so divided that those who were in favor of the bill as reported from the committee had control of one half of the time and those who were opposed to it had control of the remainder of the time, from 2.30 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock. I believe those who are in favor of the bill as reported from the committee have exhausted their time. Am I right about that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time was divided so far as debate was concerned. The Chair can hardly hold that when debate has terminated either side has preference as to the offering of amendments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it may be that a debate would occur upon an amendment offered——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Which would come within the arrangement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, at the end of line 25, after the word "master," it is proposed to insert "owner of."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would suggest that as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] offered an amendment relating to an earlier section of the bill——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was offered while the present occupant of the chair was out of the Chamber.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was withdrawn with the understanding that we would begin at the beginning of the bill and take up the various sections of the bill and offer amendments in some sort of consecutive order. As I have an amendment to propose to line 17, page 20, I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that we begin with the Senate bill, at the first section, and proceed with it section by section, offering amendments.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to perfect this bill, so that it may be in shape to express what the committee desired. It seems to me those amendments should be first introduced.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is proper, Mr. President.

Mr. BURTON. There are four or five of them. They will not take a very long time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is the recognized procedure.

Mr. BURTON. The one which I have just offered is to cure a misprint.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] will be agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to transfer page 39 to page 37, following line 20.

Mr. NELSON. I object to the transfer. It transposes it from that part of the bill which defines what an able-bodied seaman is.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. It ought to follow that.

Mr. BURTON. But it brings together the sections which pertain to the qualifications of the seamen and the lifeboat men. It brings them together. I will ask that it be read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it will make it impossible, without reconstructing amendments which have been prepared to be offered to the bill, to offer them with that transfer made.

Mr. BURTON. It can be very readily followed by taking page 39, which really belongs on page 37, as I suggested.

Mr. NELSON. I do not agree with the Senator on that point.

Mr. BURTON. It will be perfectly clear when that follows.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, but we shall have to rewrite all our amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it would seem to be a queer amendment to transfer one page to another page without specifying where it is to come in.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. CUMMINS. A former occupant of the chair ruled that debate had closed upon this bill. Therefore debate is not now in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am simply asking the Senator from Ohio to state what part of page 37 he wishes this other page transferred to.

Mr. BURTON. Immediately after line 20. It is necessary that it shall go with the other provisions, relating to the qualifications of seamen. Another reason is that at the end of that section the dates on which the regulations are to take effect are specified, and if page 39 should remain where it now is there would be no direction relating to the time when that provision takes effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has just read the unanimous-consent agreement, and is of opinion that the voting will take place without discussion after the general debate has ended. The general debate seems to have ended, so that the Chair will be constrained to rule that debate is not now in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know that the general debate has ended. We concluded debate here in an effort to get a quorum, and immediately thereafter the Senator from Ohio rose to offer an amendment. Before the Chair makes any ruling of that sort I want to enter in the RECORD the platforms of the Republican and the Democratic Parties with respect to this proposed legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to transfer all on page 39 to page 37, following line 20.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon that amendment to the amendment I ask to have read what I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM, 1912.

We favor the speedy enactment of laws to provide that seamen shall not be compelled to endure involuntary servitude and that life and property shall be safeguarded by the ample equipment of vessels with life-saving appliances and with full complements of skilled, able-bodied seamen to operate them.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM, 1912.

We urge upon Congress the speedy enactment of laws for the greater security of life and property at sea; and we favor the repeal of all laws, and the abrogation of so much of our treaties with other nations, as provide for the arrest and imprisonment of seamen charged with desertion, or with violation of their contract of service. Such laws and treaties are un-American and violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURTON. I offer another amendment, which I sent to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 40 it is proposed to strike out lines 1, 2, and 3, which read as follows——

Mr. BURTON. That goes with the other. The other one not having been adopted, it is to be abandoned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Ohio withdraws the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BURTON. In view of the fact that the other amendment was not adopted, that one is abandoned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BURTON. I now offer another amendment: On page 39, line 6, I move to strike out the word "if," after the word "that."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 39, line 6, it is proposed to strike out "if," so that if amended it will read:

That upon examination, under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce and Labor, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. I now move, on page 42, to strike out lines 7 and 8. Those lines are unnecessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 42 it is proposed to strike out lines 7 and 8 in the following words:

Section 5280, Revised Statutes, repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know the effect of repealing that statute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment, and then the text as it would read if amended.

The SECRETARY. On page 42 it is proposed to strike out lines 7 and 8, the last two lines in the amendment, as follows:

Section 5280, Revised Statutes, repealed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What is the statute that is sought to be repealed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio can probably inform the Senator from Oregon as to that.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is more familiar with it than I am.

Mr. NELSON. I suppose the matter is not open to debate; but I ask to have the section of the statute read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it will be read. The Chair will entertain debate until the hour of 8 o'clock, without objection.

Mr. NELSON. Lines 7 and 8 repeal that statute; and the motion is to strike out those lines.

Mr. BURTON. I understand the Senator from Minnesota received information in regard to this matter from the Commissioner of Navigation.

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURTON. On examining that section I am not so sure that it should be repealed. I think it had better be allowed to remain.

Mr. NELSON. The bill proposes to repeal it, and the Senator's motion is to strike out the two lines repealing the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read section 5280 as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 5280. On application of a consul or vice consul of any foreign government having a treaty with the United States stipulating for the restoration of seamen deserting, made in writing, stating that the person therein named has deserted from a vessel of any such government, while in any port of the United States, and on proof by the exhibition of the register of the vessel, ship's roll, or other official document, that the person named belonged, at the time of desertion, to the crew of such vessel, it shall be the duty of any court, judge, commissioner of any circuit court, justice, or other magistrate, having competent power, to issue warrants to cause such person to be arrested for examination. If, on examination, the facts stated are found to be true, the person arrested not being a citizen of the United States, shall be delivered up to the consul or vice consul, to be sent back to the dominions of any such government, or, on the request and at the expense of the consul or vice consul, shall be detained until the consul or vice consul finds an opportunity to send him back to the dominions of any such government. No person so arrested shall be detained more than two months after his arrest; but at the end of that time shall be set at liberty, and shall not be again molested for the same cause.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the copy I have before me shows that line and a half stricken out. It ought to be repealed, and I will ask the Secretary in what form the bill is as he has it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill as reported from the committee contains those two lines as a part of the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. BURTON. The lines ought to stay, and no amendment is required. A copy had been handed me in which the lines are erased. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not quite sure that it is the effect of this legislation to repeal that statute. However, it may be a mere memorandum furnished the committee showing that that provision of the Revised Statutes stands repealed by this legislation.

Mr. BURTON. I think, Mr. President, it would be better to take no chances on that. It is a section of the Revised Statutes which is altogether obnoxious to the action we are seeking to take in doing away with arrests for desertion. I will say to the Senator from Florida that if there is any mistake it can be arranged in conference; but I should prefer not to run the risk of allowing the lines to be stricken out, because the statute might then remain as law.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, line 5, section 14, of the House text, strike out "one barge" and insert "two barges," so that section 14 will read:

SEC. 14. That towing of more than two barges or other vessels 50 miles or more," etc.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I do not know any objection from any source to this amendment. The reason why I offer it is because there will possibly be a vote between the bill as reported by the committee of the Senate and the bill as passed by the House. If the House bill should pass by the vote of the Senate, I should like to have that provision in it; and I think it is in order, because the committee reported to strike out all the House text and insert the provisions contained in the Senate committee bill. It would seem to me that the text of the House bill ought to be perfected before the motion to strike out and insert is passed upon.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have decided objections to that. There is no portion of the bill to which the seamen objected more than to allowing the towing of two barges.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to say to the Senator——

Mr. NELSON. I make the point of order on the amendment, and I think the Senator from Virginia will agree with me. We are now considering the substitute. That should be first amended, and after that, if the substitute is voted down, then the Senator's amendment would be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is not sustained. It is entirely proper to perfect the original text.

Mr. SWANSON. So far as the remark of the Senator from Ohio is concerned, I will say that the seamen who favor this bill came to see me and stated that they have no objection to section 14 going out. If I mistake not the Senate committee bill itself strikes it all out. The only objection to having this amendment made is to try to get for the Senate bill the support of those who want two barges. I can see no purpose on the part of the Senator from Ohio except to give the Senate bill a strength it otherwise would not have. There has not been any loss of life whatever by towing two barges instead of one on all the rivers and in all the lumber business all over the United States where it is conducted by means of barges. To compel simply one barge instead of two to be towed would be an absolute disadvantage to that business.

Mr. BURTON. This is a perfectly simple proposition. It was discussed at very considerable length before the committee. The bill as it passed the House provided that not more than one barge should be towed unless the barges were furnished with propelling power, sails or otherwise. Those interested in these barges appeared before the committee and objected to that provision. They said they were willing, however, to have two instead of limiting it to one. To that the seamen strenuously objected. It was recognized, however, that there were many Senators who were opposed to that limitation. Hence the Senate committee, with the reluctant consent of the seamen but without opposition certainly from those who favored the use of barges, agreed on the provision which is now section 16. Section 16 contains no limitation, but does provide for a record being made of the loss of life and a report to Congress by the officer to whom such records on loss of life are transmitted.

I should most decidedly object, however, to the insertion of the provision that there shall be two barges allowed without propelling power, because I regard that kind of navigation as exceedingly dangerous to human life. Those who are interested in the use of barges, I may repeat, preferred the form as it is in the Senate committee bill. The seamen did not like it, but thought it better than to allow two barges.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand the Senator from Ohio, then, the Senate bill strikes out section 14 entirely?

Mr. BURTON. It places no limitation on the use of those barges.

Mr. SWANSON. I will accept an amendment to make no limitation, and let section 14 go out of the House text.

Mr. BURTON. I think it might as well go out as to appear in the form in which it is in the Senate committee bill, for I really consider this to be a kind of navigation where there is serious danger to human life. The barges are frail, their draft is slight, and to allow them to go out to sea is like sending out a ready-made coffin. I should decidedly object to allowing two barges. In view of the strenuous opposition to the paragraph as it passed the House, the seamen consented that the form as it appears in the Senate bill should remain.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. In regard to the bill as proposed by the Senate committee, I have no objection in so far as this barge matter is concerned——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator from Maryland yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Certainly, although I should like to finish the sentence. I say I have no objection, because there is going to be an investigation to disclose whether there is any trouble or defect in the present system of towing barges. To that I have no objection. Now I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was going to say that I think I am in a position to know the views of the seamen upon this amendment, and I state without any hesitation that I believe it to be their idea that it is a matter of small consequence. Other things are of greater moment and importance to them than is this provision. Even though this be stricken out in whole, if the Senate bill can be radically changed or the House bill passed, they will accept it as some amelioration of the hard conditions under which they have been obliged to prosecute their livelihood.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I am not opposing——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Except that I wanted to say in regard to this matter——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived——

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The fact is that the present law allows three barges to be towed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour for voting has arrived, and no further debate can be entertained under the unanimous-consent agreement. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to the House text. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18 of the House text, line 5, strike out "one barge" and insert "two barges," so as to read:

SEC. 14. That towing of more than two barges or other vessels 30 miles or more through the open sea is hereby prohibited, unless such barges or vessels so towed are provided with sail or other motive power and a crew sufficient to manage such barges or vessels.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BURTON. There is one further amendment that I desire to offer. In line 19, on page 36, I move to strike out the words "in each department." It is a verbal correction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 36, line 19, before the word "shall," strike out the words "in each department," so as to read:

Unless the crew shall include a sufficient number of seamen who understand the languages of both officers and crew, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On page 20, line 17, I move to strike out the words "and property," after the word "life."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, line 17, after the word "life," strike out the words "and property," so as to read:

For the safety of the vessel or her cargo or for the saving of life aboard other vessels in jeopardy.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On page 20, after the word "Thanksgiving," in line 22, I move to insert the words "election day," and to insert after the words "election day" a comma, so that election day shall stand in that enumeration as one of the holidays for seamen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the Senator whether that would include municipal or State elections, or other elections besides National elections?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will just leave it "Election Day."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, line 22, after the word "Thanksgiving," insert the words "election day," so as to read:

While the vessel is in a safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sundays or the following-named legal holidays: New Year's Day, Washington's Birthday, Good Friday, the Fourth of July, Labor Day, Columbus Day, Thanksgiving, Election Day, and Christmas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes appear to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask for a division. I think seamen should be permitted to attend elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again by sound.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On page 21, line 6, after the word "yachts," I move to strike out the balance of line 6, and all of line 7 and all of line 8 up to and including the word "hours" on line 8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will insert "or" before "yachts"?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is right.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, line 16, before the word "yachts," insert "or," and after the word "yachts" strike out "vessels of less than 300 gross tons or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 24 hours," so as to read:

But this section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRIGGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WARSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. I understand that he has not voted. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON]. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. BRISTOW. I was requested to state that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] are detained from the Chamber on a conference committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move to strike out after the word "ton," in line 7, on page 21, the remainder of line 7 and all of line 8 in the following words: "Or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 24 hours."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On page 30 I wish to offer an amendment. I am not certain but that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] proposes to move to strike out the entire provision. If so, I will waive proposing my amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. A parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move to strike out the entire subdivision, beginning in line 4, on page 30.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My parliamentary inquiry is——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to state my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator allow me to state my amendment? Then I will yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. My amendment is to strike out subdivision 9, on page 30, lines 4 to 13, inclusive. I am sorry I interrupted the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My understanding of the amendment upon which the yea-and-nay vote was taken was to strike out, in line 6, beginning with the word "vessels," and lines 7 and 8, down to and including the word "hours." I should like to inquire if that is the case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That matter has been disposed of. The Chair will say it can be renewed when the bill goes to the Senate, if it is desired to do so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator has addressed the question to me I will state that is the amendment I offered, and which was voted down upon the roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, strike out from line 4 to line 13, inclusive, in the following words:

> Ninth. For each refusal or willful neglect to engage in boat or fire practice or drill, and for each refusal when engaged in boat drill, and so directed by the master, to efficiently assist in launching the ship's lifeboats the seaman shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year and by forfeiture of all wages earned: Provided, That no boat or fire drill shall be called for the purpose of preventing the men from quitting the service. The provisions of this section shall apply to all merchant vessels of the United States.

Mr. BURTON. To save time, I will state that I shall not object to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On line 20, page 33, after the word "employment," I move to strike out the remainder of that line and all of lines 21, 22, 23, and 24 on that page, and lines 2 and 3 on page 34 down to and including the word "shipped."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, beginning with line 20, with the word "or," strike out the following:

> Or shall by any threat or force dissuade or prevent or endeavor to dissuade or prevent any person from taking employment on board any vessel, or shall by any threat or force dissuade or prevent or endeavor to dissuade or prevent any person from remaining in the service of any vessel on which he has shipped, or by any threat or force induce or compel any person to disregard or disobey any lawful order or orders of the master or other licensed officer of the vessel on which he is shipped.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask for a division.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRIGGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON]. I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and vote. I make this announcement for the day. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and withhold my vote.

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KERN. I again announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the evening.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Ashurst	Fall	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On page 36, in line 19, I move to strike out, beginning with the word "unless," the balance of that line and all of lines 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, on that page, and all of lines 1 and 2 on page 37.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 36, line 19, beginning with the word "unless," strike out the following words:

unless the crew shall include a sufficient number of seamen who understand the languages of both officers and crew, through whom the orders of the officers may be communicated in a manner to be readily understood by the seamen, in any department, to whom such orders are given. The number of seamen through whom the orders of the officers may be transmitted shall not be less than the number of lifeboats such vessel is required to carry, and at least one of such seamen shall be assigned to each lifeboat.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected, there being, on a division, ayes 17, noes 37.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on page 37, line 3, I move to strike out the words "carrying passengers."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, line 3, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "carrying passengers," so that it will read:

No vessel, except those navigating rivers exclusively.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. BURTON. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and withhold my vote.

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 47, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—47.

Asaurst	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard
Borah	Johnson, Me.	Myers	Smith, Ariz.

So the amendment of Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On page 37, in line 11, I move to strike out of the committee amendment the words "the master" and to insert in lieu thereof "the board of local inspectors."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, line 11, it is proposed to strike out the words "the master" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the board of local inspectors," so that if amended it will read:

A seaman shall be entitled to the rating of efficient lifeboat hand who has shown by practical test to the satisfaction of the board of local inspectors that he is qualified to perform any duty required in the launching and handling of lifeboats, etc.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon that amendment to the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I again transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Ashurst	Fall	McCumber	Poindexter
Borah	Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Pomerene

So the amendment of Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on page 39, line 1, I move to strike out the words "carrying passengers for hire," because one life is worth as much as another.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 39, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the words "carrying passengers for hire," so that if amended it will read:

No vessel, except those navigating rivers exclusively, shall depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have as part of her crew a sufficient number of wheelsmen or quartermasters, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On page 39, line 15, after the word "yachts," I move to strike out the remainder of that line, all of line 16, and line 17 to and including the word "hours," in that line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 39, in line 15, beginning with the word "vessels," it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Vessels of less than 300 gross tons, or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 12 hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I must ask for the yeas and nays on that. It is a tremendously important amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I ask for a count—a standing count.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks for a division.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 24, noes 27.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee is not agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment. It is a very important amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain a second demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think they ought to be accorded by the Senate, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain that request. The yeas and nays were denied.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood that the last count was to determine whether or not we should have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. STONE. I so understood.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Missouri so understood, and other Senators did, I think.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I so understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair knows of no rule or custom requiring a count to be taken to determine whether the yeas and nays shall be ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not see how the yeas and nays can be determined without a count. If one-fifth of those stand in favor of ordering the yeas and nays, that would indicate that the yeas and nays shall be accorded.

Mr. LODGE. A Senator can demand the other side on a request for the yeas and nays, but he can not demand a vote upon it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What does that mean except a count?

Mr. LODGE. After the yeas and nays have been demanded and the Chair has announced that a sufficient number have not seconded the demand, a Senator can ask for the other side to show whether one-fifth of the Senators present have seconded the demand. If that fails, then there is nothing that can be done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent that the yeas and nays be taken.

Mr. STONE. It is not a question of unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will solve that problem by asking that the vote be taken by yeas and nays. Senators agreeing to the amendment to the amendment will, when their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay."

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the amendment to the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 39, line 15, beginning with the word "vessels," it is proposed to strike out:

vessels of less than 300 gross tons, or vessels whose regular schedule between terminal ports does not exceed 12 hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I again transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I desire to transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Ashurst	Jones	Page	Webb
Borah	Kavanaugh	Pittman	Williams

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think, Mr. President, that is all the amendments I have to offer for the present.

Mr. BURTON obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee to which I think there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

Mr. LODGE. It is to be added as a new section.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 16. That section 16 of the act approved December 21, 1898, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," be amended by adding at the end of the section the following:

"Provided, That at the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and under such regulations as he may prescribe, if any seaman incapacitated from service by injury or illness is on board a vessel so situated that a prompt discharge requiring the personal appearance of the master of the vessel before an American consul or consular agent is impracticable, such seaman may be sent to a consul or consular agent, who shall care for him and defray the cost of his maintenance and transportation as provided in this paragraph."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire if it is in order now to offer an amendment by way of perfecting the House text of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will answer that after the pending question has been settled. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from North Carolina that the amendment he suggests is in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move to strike out all of section 14, on page 18, of the House bill, so called, and insert in lieu thereof what I have marked on page 40 of the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina submits an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18 it is proposed to strike out section 14, as printed in the House text of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

SEC. 14. That the owner, agent, or master of every barge which, while in tow for 50 miles or more through the open sea, has sustained or caused any accident, shall be subject in all respects to the provisions of sections 10, 11, 12, and 13 of chapter 344 of the Statutes at Large approved June 20, 1874, and the reports therein prescribed shall be transmitted by collectors of customs to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who shall transmit annually to Congress a summary of such reports during the previous fiscal year, together with a brief statement of the action of the department in respect to such accidents.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to have the Secretary read section 14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Section 14 of the original text will be read.

The SECRETARY. Section 14 of the House text reads as follows:

SEC. 14. That towing of more than one barge or other vessel 50 miles or more through the open sea is hereby prohibited, unless such barges or vessels so towed are provided with sail or other motive power and a crew sufficient to manage such barges or vessels.

Any person, firm, or corporation violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,500, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask where that amendment is proposed to be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to strike out section 14 and insert the language that has been read.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that this is a proposition to strike out the section and insert the Senate substitute for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BURTON. I suggest that the substitute reported by the Senate committee takes care of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again state that debate is not in order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The bill reported and submitted, which the Senate is considering, is a substitute for the House bill. Is it competent now, before that is disposed of, to treat the House bill as the pending bill and change section 14 in it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unquestionably so. Amendments to the original text have preference over amendments to the substitute. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURTON. I move to substitute the bill reported by the Senate committee, as amended, for the House text.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary motion. The question is upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. BURTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. I desire to ask for a vote in the Senate on the amendment at the top of page 39, line 1. The adoption of the amendment as amended will not preclude having that vote taken in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can reserve that amendment.

Mr. BURTON. I will reserve, then, that amendment for a vote in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment as amended. The Senator can reserve it when the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, referring to the inquiry made by the Senator from Ohio, I understand the question now is on reporting to the Senate the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As amended.

Mr. LODGE. As amended. If the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which is the committee amendment, is adopted, it takes the place of the whole bill, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It certainly does.

Mr. LODGE. Then can a reservation be made of each amendment made to it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks a motion to strike out any portion of the amendment after it reaches the Senate would be in order. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BURTON. I ask for a vote on the amendment in line 1, page 39, striking out the words "carrying passengers for hire."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is the precise point. If I am not mistaken, what comes over to the Senate is one amendment. We struck out the House text and inserted another bill after the enacting clause, which, of course, perfected that amendment; but it remained one amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of opinion that in the Senate an amendment that has been adopted as in Committee of the Whole may be amended.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I quite agree to that; but how can we reserve amendments when there is only one amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not reserved. The Senator from Ohio now moves to amend the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. That is all right.

Mr. BURTON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "carrying passengers for hire," on page 39, line 1. On that I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. The vote reinstating those words or inserting them is, I take it, "aye"?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 39, line 1, after the word "vessel," insert "carrying passengers for hire."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I should like to inquire whether the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent from the Chamber, and that the pair I announced on the first roll call will apply during the evening or until he returns. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Brady	Crane	Oliver	Smoot
Briggs	Crawford	Paynter	Stephenson
Bryan	Fletcher	Percy	Wetmore
Burnham	Foster	Richardson
Burton	Gallinger	Root
Clark, Wyo.	Gamble	Smith, Ga.

Clapp	La Follette	Owen	Williams
Cummins	Lea	Page	Works

Catron	Guggenheim	Simmons	Watson
Chilton	Jackson	Smith, Ariz.	Webb
Clarke, Ark.	Kavanaugh	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Kern	Sutherland
Cullom	Lippitt	Swanson

So Mr. BURTON'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in order that we may understand the matter, an affirmative vote on that proposition would adopt the bill reported from the Senate committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As amended?

Mr. LODGE. As amended.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Instead of the House text?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Instead of the House text.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And a negative vote would adopt the House text in preference to the bill as amended?

Mr. LODGE. No; then the question would arise on putting on its passage the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct, if the substitute is voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in, there being on a division—ayes 41, noes 20.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea."

Mr. BURTON. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BURTON, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. FLETCHER conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the amendment of the Senate No. 132 to the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; disagreeing to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the bill, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 132, insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House, agree to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. CURTIS, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. SMITH of Maryland conferees on the part of the Senate.

DEMOTION OF WILLIAM HALL AND OTHERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 4, 1912, the correspondence in the Post Office Department relating to the demotion in 1911 of William Hall, C. H. Erwin, R. E. Erwin, J. J. Negley, and E. P. Rodman, clerks in the Railway Mail Service, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OWEN. I present a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of Oklahoma, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 16.

Whereas the report of the General Land Office at Washington, D. C., of July 1, 1912, shows that there is 39,525 acres of unappropriated and unreserved public lands in the State of Oklahoma; and
Whereas the character of this land is such that it is not suitable for agricultural purposes and consists principally of isolated tracts; and
Whereas the same has been subject to homestead entry since the opening of this country in the years 1889, 1891, and 1893, and no entries have been made thereon; and
Whereas the lands above mentioned are now under the jurisdiction of the United States land office of Oklahoma; and
Whereas it will cost the United States Government practically as much money to finally dispose of said lands as same are now worth; and
Whereas chapter 112, Session Laws of Oklahoma, 1911, created a fund known as "Consolidated school district fund" and set aside section 33 in original Greer County as it existed on November 15, 1907, and all lands selected in lieu thereof, for the benefit of this fund; and
Whereas the value of this land as shown by the recent appraisement and including that which has been sold is $406,433; and
Whereas this fund is inadequate to assist in building schoolhouses as contemplated by the legislature: Therefore

Be it resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States of America be requested and memoralized to grant to the State of Oklahoma for the use and benefit of the consolidated public schools of said State all of the land lying within said State which is unappropriated and all land upon may hereafter be canceled and all other land which might now be or may hereafter be cancelled and all other land which might now be or may hereafter become vacant. Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of the United States Senate, a copy to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, a copy to the General Land Office, and a copy to each of the Representatives in Congress from the State of Oklahoma.

Adopted by the senate the 15th day of February, 1913.

C. B. KENDRICK,
President Pro Tempore of the Senate.

Attest:
NED MCDANIEL, Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted by the house the 21st day of February, 1913.

J. H. MAXEY,
Speaker of the House.

Attest:
GUS POOL, Chief Clerk of the House.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA, ss.

I, Ned McDaniel, the duly elected and qualified secretary of the senate of the State of Oklahoma, hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a full, true, correct, and complete copy of senate concurrent resolution 16, as the same appears of record in my office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand this 25th day of February, 1913.

NED MCDANIEL,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. I present a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of Oklahoma, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 18.

A resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to secure second-class postage rates for the Publicity Pamphlet.

Whereas Oklahoma is fully committed to the policy of the "people's rule" in its highest and best sense; and
Whereas the best results can be hoped for only when the people are fully and correctly informed as to the measures upon which they are to cast their ballots; and
Whereas the method of distributing the Publicity Pamphlet heretofore used has not given satisfaction: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Oklahoma State Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the Senators and Congressmen from this State be each furnished a copy of this resolution and that they be requested to take such action as may be necessary to have the Publicity Pamphlet admitted to the mails as second-class matter.

Adopted by the Senate the 15th day of February, 1913.

J. J. MCALESTER,
President of the Senate.

Attest:
NED MCDANIEL,
Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted by the house of representatives the 21st day of February, 1913.

J. H. MAXEY,
Speaker of the House.

Attest:
GUS POOL,
Chief Clerk of the House.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA, ss:

I, Ned McDaniel, the duly elected and qualified secretary of the Senate of the State of Oklahoma, hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a full, true, correct, and complete copy of senate concurrent resolution 18 as the same appears of record in my office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand this 25th day of February, 1913.

NED MCDANIEL,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of New Britain, Conn., remonstrating against any appropriation being made for the celebration of the 100 years of peace with Great Britain, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Norwich, Conn., and a petition of Meadow Brook Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of North Windham, Conn., praying for the passage of the so-called agricultural extension bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

CIVIL WAR PENSIONS.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 6400) increasing pensions of widows of the Civil War, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report (No. 1337) thereon.

SPECIAL RESIDENT COMMISSIONER OF LINCOLN MEMORIAL.

Mr. ROOT. I introduce a bill which must be introduced now if it is to be passed, and upon which I think there is a very general agreement. I ask for its present consideration.

The bill (S. 8589) relating to supervision of the Lincoln Memorial was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the exercise of its control and direction for the construction of the Lincoln Memorial, authorized by act of Congress approved February 9, 1911, the commission created by said act shall designate to perform the duty of special resident commissioner to represent the commission in the oversight of the work the Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM, who, at the time of the adoption of this act, is the senior member of the commision in continuous service of the United States; and for the special service of the member so designated he shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 a year out of the appropriations for the construction of such memorial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks for the present consideration of the bill just introduced by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, last night I presented a motion. I meant it to be a motion then made, to go over until Monday. It is printed as a notice of a motion Monday. I fear that it might be subject to a point of order on Monday, and might be carried over to Tuesday. I meant to present it as a motion then, but not to insist upon its being heard then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will accept the statement of the Senator from Georgia, and treat it as though the motion had been made.

CAPT. HERBERT A. WHITE.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, was received.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to make a request. A military nomination has just been received by the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that, as in executive session, it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a military nomination by the President of the United States be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as in executive session. Is there objection?

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the nomination, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nomination will be read.

The SECRETARY. To be judge advocate, with the rank of major, Capt. Herbert A. White.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes appears to have it.

Mr. ASHURST. I call for a division.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I understand that if present he would vote "nay," and as I shall vote that way myself, I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). May I be permitted to explain my vote before voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not permitted by the rules, but, if there is no objection, the Senator may do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I wish to say is, that in view of the day and the hour my preference is to go home, but there are Senators who think I was a party to an agreement to go now into executive session, and therefore I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I observe that my pair, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], has not voted, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 52, as follows:

The commission shall ascertain, determine, and order such rates, charges, and regulations, and the duration thereof, as may be necessary to give effect to such arrangement, but the right and power to make such other and further changes in rates, charges, and regulations as the commission may ascertain and determine to be necessary and reasonable, and the right to alter or amend all orders relative thereto, is reserved and vested in the commission notwithstanding any such arrangement and mutual agreement.

"PAR. 19. That each public utility shall furnish to the commission in such form and at such times as the commission shall require, such accounts, reports, and information as shall show in itemized detail: Depreciation; salaries and wages; legal expenses; taxes and rentals; quantity and value of material used; receipts from residuals, by-products, services, or other sales; total and net costs; net and gross profits; dividends and interest; surplus or reserve; prices paid by consumers; and in addition such other items, whether of a nature similar to those hereinbefore enumerated or otherwise, as the commission may prescribe, in order to show completely and in detail the entire operation of the public utility in furnishing its product or service to the public.

"PAR. 20. That the commission shall publish annual reports showing its proceedings relating to all the public utilities of each kind in the District of Columbia, and such other occasional reports as it may deem advisable. The commission shall also publish in its annual reports the value of all property actually used and useful for the convenience of the public, of every public utility as to whose rates, charges, service, or regulations any hearing has been held by the commission or the value of whose property has been ascertained by it under the provisions of this section.

"PAR. 21. That the commission shall ascertain and fix adequate and serviceable standards for the measurement of quality, pressure, initial voltage, or other condition pertaining to the supply of the product or service rendered by any public utility, and prescribe reasonable regulations for examining and testing such product or service and for the measurement thereof. It shall establish reasonable rules, regulations, specifications, and standards to secure the accuracy of all meters and appliances for measurements and every public utility is required to carry into effect all orders issued by the commission relative thereto.

"PAR. 22. That the commission shall provide for the examination and testing of any and all appliances used for the measuring of any product or service of a public utility. Any consumer or user may have any such appliance tested upon payment of the fees fixed by the commission. The commission shall declare and establish reasonable fees to be paid for testing such appliances on the request of the consumers or users, the fee to be paid by the consumer or user at the time of his request, but to be paid by the public utility and repaid to the consumer or user if the appliance be found defective or incorrect to the disadvantage of the consumer or user.

"PAR. 23. That the commission may purchase such materials, apparatus, and standard measuring instruments for such examination and tests as it may deem necessary. The commission, its agents, experts, or examiners, shall have power to enter upon any premises occupied by any public utility for the purpose of making the examinations and tests provided for in this section, and to set up and use on such premises any apparatus and appliances and occupy reasonable space therefor.

"PAR. 24. That every public utility shall file with the commission, within a time to be fixed by the commission, schedules, which shall be open to public inspection, showing all rates, tolls, and charges which it has established and which are in force at the time for any service performed by it within the District of Columbia, or for any service in connection therewith or performed by any public utility controlled or operated by it. The rates, tolls, and charges shown on such schedules shall not exceed the rates, tolls, and charges now allowed by law, and shall be the lawful rates, tolls, and charges within the District of Columbia, and shall remain and be in force until set aside by the commission.

"PAR. 25. That every public utility shall file with and as a part of such schedule all rules and regulations that in any manner affect the rates charged or to be charged for any service.

"PAR. 26. That a copy of so much of said schedules as the commission shall deem necessary for the use of the public shall be printed in plain type and kept on file in every station and office of such public utility where payments are made by the consumers or users, open to the public, in such form and place as to be readily accessible to the public and so as to be conveniently inspected.

"PAR. 27. That where a schedule of joint rates or charges is, or may be, in force between two or more public utilities, such schedule shall in like manner be printed and filed with the commission, and so much thereof as the commission shall deem necessary for the use of the public shall be filed in such station or office, as provided in the preceding paragraph.

"PAR. 28. That no change shall thereafter be made in any schedule, including schedules of joint rates, except upon ten days' notice to the commission, and all such changes shall be plainly indicated upon existing schedules, or by filing new schedules in lieu thereof ten days prior to the time the same are to take effect: Provided, That the commission, upon application of any public utility, may prescribe a less time within which a reduction may be made.

"PAR. 29. That copies of all new schedules shall be filed, as hereinbefore provided, in every station and office of such public utility where payments are made by consumers or users 10 days prior to the time the same are to take effect, unless the commission shall prescribe a less time.

"PAR. 30. That it shall be unlawful for any public utility to charge, demand, collect, or receive a greater or less compensation for any service performed by it within the District of Columbia, or for any service in connection therewith, that is specified in such printed schedules, including schedules of joint rates, as may at the time be in force, or to demand, collect, or receive any rate, toll, or charge not specified in such schedules. The rates, tolls, and charges named therein shall be the lawful rates, tolls, and charges until the same are changed as provided in this section.

"PAR. 31. That the commission may prescribe such changes in the form in which the schedules are issued by any public utility as may be found to be expedient.

"PAR. 32. That the commission shall have power to adopt reasonable and proper rules and regulations relative to all inspections, tests, audits, and investigations, and to adopt and publish reasonable and proper rules to govern its proceedings and to regulate the mode and manner of all investigations and hearings of public utilities and other parties before it.

"PAR. 33. That the commission shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the business of all public utilities is conducted, and shall have the right to obtain from any public utility all necessary information to enable the commission to perform its duties.

"PAR. 34. That the commission or any commissioner or any person or persons employed by the commission for that purpose shall, upon demand, have the right to inspect the books, accounts, papers, records, and memoranda of any public utility, and to examine, under oath, any officer, agent, or employee of such public utility in relation to its business and affairs. Any person other than one of said commissioners who shall make such demand shall produce his authority to make such inspection or examination.

"PAR. 35. That the commission may require, by order or subpœna, to be served upon any public utility in the same manner that a summons is served in a civil action in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the production within the District of Columbia at such time and place as it may designate of any books, accounts, papers, or records kept by such public utility in any office or place without the District of Columbia, or verified copies in lieu thereof, if the commission shall so order, in order that an examination thereof may be made by the commission under its direction. Any public utility failing or refusing to comply with any order or subpœna shall for each day it shall so fail or refuse forfeit and pay to the District of Columbia the sum of $100, to be recovered in an action to be brought in the name of said District.

"Attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States. And in case of disobedience to a subpœna the commission, or any party to a proceeding before the commission, may invoke the aid of any court of the United States or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this section. And the said commission is hereby given power to call on any district attorney of the United States, the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, or any counsel of the commission to enforce the provisions of this section in the proper courts of the United States, and on such call it shall be the duty of the said district attorney, corporation counsel, or any counsel of the commission, upon request of said commission, to enforce the provisions of this paragraph, the costs and expenses incurred to be paid out of the appropriations for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

"PAR. 36. That for the purpose of making any investigation with regard to any public utility the commission shall have power to appoint, by an order in writing, an agent, whose duties shall be prescribed in such order. In the discharge of his duties such agent shall have every power whatsoever of an inquisitorial nature granted in this section to the commission and shall have power to administer oaths and take depositions. The commission may conduct any number of such investigations contemporaneously through different agents, and may delegate to such agent or agents the taking of all testimony bearing upon any investigation or hearing. The decision of the commission shall be based upon its examination of all testimony and records. The recommendations made by such agents shall be advisory only and shall not preclude the taking of further testimony, if the commission so order, nor further investigation.

"PAR. 37. That every public utility shall furnish to the commission all information required by it to carry into effect the provisions of this section, and shall make specific answers to all specific questions submitted by the commission. Any public utility receiving from the commission any blanks with directions to fill the same shall cause the same to be properly filled out so as to answer, fully and correctly, each question therein propounded, and in case it is unable to answer any question it shall give a good and sufficient reason for such failure; and said answer shall be verified under oath by the president, secretary, superintendent, or general manager of such public utility, and returned to the commission at its office within the period fixed by the commission. Whenever required by the commission, every public utility shall deliver to the commission any or all maps, profiles, contracts, reports of engineers, and all documents, books, accounts, papers, and records, or copies of any or all of the same, with a complete inventory of all its property, in such form as the commission may direct.

"PAR. 38. That upon its own initiative or upon reasonable complaint made against any public utility that any of the rates, tolls, charges, or schedules, or services, or time and conditions of payment, or any joint rate or rates, schedules, or services, are in any respect unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, or that any time schedule, regulation, or act whatsoever affecting or relating to the conduct of any street railway or common carrier, or the production, transmission, delivery, or furnishing of heat, light, water, or power, or any service in connection therewith, or the conveyance of any telegraph or telephone message, or any service in connection therewith, is in any respect unreasonable, insufficient, or unjustly discriminatory, or that any service is inadequate or can not be obtained, the commission may, in its discretion, proceed, with or without notice, to make such investigation as it may deem necessary or convenient. But no order affecting said rates, tolls, charges, schedules, regulations, or act complained of shall be entered by the commission without a formal hearing.

"PAR. 39. That the commission shall prior to such formal hearing notify the public utility complained of that a complaint has been made, and 10 days after such notice has been given the commission may proceed to set a time and place for a hearing and an investigation as hereinafter provided.

"PAR. 40. That the commission shall give the public utility and the complainant, if any, 10 days' notice of the time and place when and where such hearing and investigation will be held and such matters considered and determined. Both the public utility and complainant shall be entitled to be heard and shall have process to enforce the attendance of witnesses.

"PAR. 41. That if upon such investigation the rates, tolls, charges, schedules, or joint rates shall be found to be unjust, unreasonable, insufficient, or unjustly discriminatory, or to be preferential or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this section, the commission shall have power to determine and by order fix and order to be substituted therefor such rate or rates, tolls, charges, or schedules as shall be just and reasonable. If upon such investigation it shall be found that any regulation, time schedule, act, or service complained of is unjust, unreasonable, insufficient, preferential, unjustly discriminatory, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this section, or if it be found that reasonable service is not supplied, the commission shall have power to determine and substitute therefor such other regulations, time schedules, service, or acts and to make such orders respecting and such changes in such regulations, time schedules, service, or acts as shall be just and reasonable. And upon any investigation for the purpose of determining upon and requiring any reasonable extension or extensions of lines or of service that shall promise to be compensatory within a reasonable time, the commission shall have power to fix, determine, and require every such extension or extensions to be made and the terms and conditions upon which the same shall be made: Provided, That no hearing shall be had and no order shall be made respecting such extension or extensions without notice to the public utility affected thereby, as provided in paragraph 40 of this section.

"PAR. 42. That if upon investigation it shall be found that any rate, toll, charge, schedule, or joint rate, or rates, is unjust, unreasonable, insufficient, or unjustly discriminatory or preferential, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this section, or that any time schedule, regulation, act, or service complained of is unjust, unreasonable, insufficient, preferential, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this section, or if it be found that reasonable service is not supplied, the public utility found to be at fault shall pay the expenses incurred by the commission upon such investigation.

"PAR. 43. That the commission may, in its discretion, when complaint is made of more than one rate or charge, order separate hearings thereon, and may consider and determine the several matters complained of separately and at such times as it may prescribe. No complaint shall of necessity at any time be dismissed because of the absence of direct damage to the complainant.

"PAR. 44. That whenever the commission shall believe that any rate or charge may be unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, or that any reasonable service is not supplied, or that an investigation of any matter relating to any public utility should for any reason be made, it may, on its own motion, summarily investigate the same with or without notice.

"PAR. 45. That if after making such investigation the commission becomes satisfied that sufficient grounds exist to warrant a formal hearing being ordered as to the matters so investigated, it shall furnish such public utility interested a statement notifying the public utility of the matters under investigation. Ten days after such notice has been given the commission may proceed to set a time and place for a hearing and an investigation as hereinbefore provided.

"PAR. 46. That notice of the time and place for such hearing shall be given to the public utility and to such other interested persons as the commission shall deem necessary, as provided in paragraph 40 of this section, and thereafter proceedings shall be had and conducted in reference to the matter investigated in like manner as though complaint had been filed with the commission relative to the matter investigated, and the same order or orders may be made in reference thereto as if such investigation had been made on complaint.

"PAR. 47. That any public utility may make complaint as to any matter affecting its own product or service with like effect as though made by the commission or upon reasonable complaint as hereinbefore provided.

"PAR. 48. That each of the commissioners and every agent provided for in paragraph 36 of this section for the purposes mentioned in this section shall have power to administer oaths, certify to official acts, issue subpœnas, compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, accounts, papers, records, documents, and testimony. In case of disobedience on the part of any person or persons to comply with any order of the commission or any commissioner, or any subpœna, or on the refusal of any witness to testify to any matter regarding which he may be interrogated before the commission or its agents authorized, it shall be the duty of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or a judge thereof, on application of a commissioner, to compel obedience by attachment proceedings for contempt, as in the case of disobedience of the requirements of a subpœna issued from such court or a refusal to testify therein.

"PAR. 49. That each witness who shall appear before the commission or its agent by its order shall receive for his attendance the fees and mileage now provided for witnesses in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, which shall be audited and paid in the same manner as fees in criminal cases within the District of Columbia are audited and paid, upon the presentation of proper vouchers, sworn to by such witnesses and approved by the chairman of the commission. No witnesses subpœnaed at the instance of parties other than the commission shall be entitled to compensation for attendance or travel unless the commission shall certify that his testimony was material to the matter investigated, and that his attendance as a witness was reasonably necessary.

"PAR. 50. That the commission or any party may, in any investigation, cause the depositions of witnesses residing within or without the District of Columbia to be taken in the manner prescribed by law for like depositions in civil actions in circuit courts.

"PAR. 51. That a full and complete record shall be kept of all proceedings had before the commission or its agents on any formal investigation had, and all testimony shall be taken down by a stenographer appointed by the commission.

"PAR. 52. That whenever any complaint is served upon the commission under the provisions of this section the commission shall, before said action is reached for trial, cause a certified transcript of all proceedings had and testimony taken upon such investigation to be filed with the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

"PAR. 53. That a transcribed copy of the evidence and proceedings, or any specific part thereof, in any investigation taken by a stenographer appointed by the commission, being certified by such stenographer to be a true and correct transcript of all the testimony in the investigation or of a particular witness, or of other specific part thereof, carefully compared by him with his original notes, and to be a correct statement of the evidence and proceedings had in such investigation so purporting to be taken and transcribed, shall be received in evidence with the same effect as if such reporter were present and testified to the fact so certified. A copy of such transcript shall be furnished on demand, free of cost, to any party to such investigation.

"PAR. 54. That no franchise nor any right to or under any franchise to own or operate any public utility as defined in this section or to use the tracks of any street railroad shall be assigned, transferred, or leased, nor shall any contract or agreement with reference to or affecting any such franchise or right be valid or of any force or effect whatsoever unless the assignment, transfer, lease, contract, or agreement shall have been approved by the commission in writing. The permission and approval of the commission to the assignment, transfer, or lease of a franchise under this paragraph shall not be construed to revive or validate any lapsed or invalid franchise or to enlarge or add to the powers and privileges contained in the grant of any franchise or to waive any forfeiture. It shall be unlawful for any street railroad corporation, gas corporation, electric corporation, telephone corporation, telegraph corporation, or other public utility corporation, directly or indirectly, to acquire the stock or bonds of any other corporation incorporated for or engaged in the same or similar business as it is, unless authorized in writing to do so by the commission, and every contract, transfer, agreement for transfer, or assignment of any such stock or bonds without such written authority shall be void and of no effect.

"PAR. 55. That the commission shall, within its jurisdiction—

"Have general supervision of all gas corporations and electrical corporations having authority under any general or special law or under any charter or franchise to lay down, erect, or maintain wires, pipes, conduits, ducts, or other fixtures in, over, or under the streets, highways, and public places in the District of Columbia for the purpose of furnishing or distributing gas or of furnishing or transmitting electricity for light, heat, or power, or maintaining underground conduits or ducts for electrical conductors, and all gas plants and electric plants owned, leased, or operated by any corporation.

"Investigate and ascertain, from time to time, the quality and quantity of gas supplied by persons or corporations; examine or investigate the methods employed by such persons and corporations in manufacturing, distributing, and supplying gas or electricity for light, heat, or power, and in transmitting the same, and have power to order such reasonable improvements as will reasonably promote the public interest, preserve the public health, and protect those using such gas or electricity and those employed in the manufacture and distribution thereof or in the manufacture and operation of the works, wires, poles, lines, conduits, ducts, and systems connected therewith, and have power to order reasonable improvements and extensions of the works, wires, poles, lines, conduits, ducts, and other reasonable devices, apparatus, and property of gas corporations and electrical corporations.

"Have power by order to fix from time to time standards for determining the purity or the measurement of the illuminating power of gas to be manufactured, distributed, or sold by persons or corporations for lighting, heating, or power purposes, and to prescribe from time to time the efficiency of the electric supply system, of the current supplied, and of the lamps furnished by the persons or corporations generating and selling electric current, and by order to require the gas so manufactured, distributed, or sold to equal the standards so fixed by it, and to prescribe from time to time the reasonable minimum and maximum pressure at which gas shall be delivered by said persons or corporations. For the purpose of determining whether the gas manufactured, distributed, or sold by such persons or corporations for lighting, heating, or power purposes conforms to the standards of illuminating power, purity, and pressure, and for the purpose of determining whether the efficiency of the electric supply system, of the current supplied, and of the lamps furnished conforms to the orders issued by the commission, the commission shall have power, of its own motion, to examine and investigate the plants and methods employed in manufacturing, delivering, and supplying gas or electricity, and shall have access, through its members or persons employed and authorized by it to make such examinations and investigations, to all parts of the manufacturing plants owned, used, or operated for the manufacture, transmission, or distribution of gas or electricity by any such persons or corporation. Any employee or agent of the commission who divulges any fact or information which may come to his knowledge during the course of any such inspection or examination, except in so far as he may be directed by the commission, or by a court or judge thereof, or authorized by law, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500 for each offense.

"PAR. 56. That no gas corporation or electrical corporation shall begin the construction of a gas plant or electric plant without first having obtained the permission and approval of the commission.

"PAR. 57. That the commission shall appoint inspectors of gas meters, whose duty it shall be, when required by the commission, to inspect, examine, prove, and ascertain the accuracy of any and all gas meters used or intended to be used for measuring or ascertaining the quantity of gas for light, heat, or power furnished by any person or corporation to or for the use of any person or corporation, and when found to be or made to be correct, the inspector shall seal all such meters and each of them with some suitable device, which device shall be recorded in the office of the commission.

"No corporation or person shall furnish, set, or put in use any gas meter which shall not have been inspected, proved, and sealed by an inspector of the commission.

"The commission shall appoint inspectors of electric meters, whose duty it shall be, when required by the commission, to inspect, examine, and ascertain the accuracy of any and all electric meters used or intended to be used for measuring and ascertaining the quantity of electric current furnished for light, heat, or power by any person or corporation to or for the use of any person or corporation, and to inspect, examine, and ascertain the accuracy of all apparatus for testing and proving the accuracy of electric meters; and when found to be or made to be correct the inspector shall stamp or mark all such meters and apparatus with some suitable device, which device shall be recorded in the office of the commission. No corporation or person shall furnish, set, or put in use any electric meter the type of which shall not have been approved by the commission or any meter not approved by an inspector of the commission.

"Every gas corporation and electrical corporation shall provide, repair, and maintain such suitable premises and apparatus and facilities as may be required and approved by the commission for testing and proving the accuracy of gas and electric meters furnished for use by it, and by which apparatus every meter may be tested.

"If any consumer to whom a meter has been furnished shall request the commission, in writing, to inspect such meter, the commission shall have the same inspected and tested; if the same, on being so tested, shall be found to be more than 4 per cent, if an electric meter, or more than 2 per cent, if a gas meter, defective or incorrect to the prejudice of the consumer, the inspector shall order the gas or electrical corporation forthwith to remove the same and to place instead a correct meter, and the expense of such inspection and test shall be borne by the corporation; if the same, on being so tested, shall be found to be correct, the expense of such inspection and test shall be borne by the consumer.

"The commission shall prescribe such rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this paragraph as it may deem necessary, and shall fix uniform reasonable charges for the inspection and testing of meters upon complaint.

"PAR. 58. That if it be alleged and established in an action brought in any court for the collection of any charge for gas or electricity that a price has been demanded in excess of that fixed by the commission or by statute no recovery shall be had therein, but the fact that such excessive charges have been made shall be a complete defense to such action.

"PAR. 59. That the appointment and power to remove the inspector of gas and meters and assistant inspectors of gas and meters from office is hereby vested in the commission. All the powers and duties of such inspectors conferred and imposed by statute shall be exercised and performed under the supervision and control of the commission: Provided, That the salaries of the inspector of gas and meters and every assistant inspector of gas and meters shall continue to be paid as heretofore and as now provided by act of Congress.

"PAR. 60. That the inspector of gas and meters now provided for by law shall transfer and deliver to the commission all books, maps, papers, records, apparatus, and the property of whatsoever description in his possession, and said commission is authorized to take possession of all books, maps, papers, records, apparatus, and property of whatsoever description.

"PAR. 61. That all public utilities to which an order of the commission applies shall make such changes in their schedules on file as may be necessary to make the same conform to said order, and no change shall thereafter be made by any public utility in any such rates, tolls, or charges, or in any joint rate or rates, without the approval of the commission. Certified copies of all other orders of the commission shall be delivered to the public utility affected thereby in like manner, and the same shall take effect within such reasonable time thereafter as the commission shall prescribe.

"PAR. 62. That the commission may, at any time, upon notice to the public utility and after opportunity to be heard as provided in paragraph 40 of this section, rescind, alter, or amend any order fixing any rate or rates, tolls, charges, or schedules, or any other order made by the commission, and certified copies of the same shall be served and take effect as herein provided for original orders.

"PAR. 63. That all rates, tolls, charges, time and condition of payment thereof, schedules, and joint rates fixed by the commission shall be in force and shall be prima facie reasonable until finally found otherwise in an action brought for that purpose.

"PAR. 64. That if at any time the commission shall be in doubt of the elements of value to be by them considered in arriving at the true valuation under the provisions of this section, they are authorized and empowered to institute a proceeding in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia petitioning said court to instruct them as to the element or elements of value to be by them considered as aforesaid, and the particular utility under valuation at the time shall be made party defendant in said action.

"That any public utility and any person or corporation interest being dissatisfied with any order or decision of the commission fixing any valuation, rate or rates, tolls, charges, schedules, joint rate or rates, or regulation, requirement, act, service or other thing complained of, may commence a proceeding in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against the commission, as defendants, to vacate, set aside, or modify any such decision or order on the ground that the valuation, rate or rates, tolls, charges, schedules, joint rate or rates or regulation, requirement, act, service, or other thing complained of fixed in such order is unlawful, inadequate, or unreasonable. The answer of the commission, on any such action being instituted against it, or the answer of any public utility on any such action being commenced by said commission against it, shall be filed within 10 days, whereupon said proceeding shall be at issue and stand ready for trial.

"All such proceedings shall have precedence over any civil cause of a different nature pending in such court, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall always be deemed open for the trial thereof, and the same shall be tried and determined as are equity proceedings in said court. Any party, including said commission, may appeal from the order or decree of said court to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, and therefrom to the Supreme Court of the United States, which shall thereupon have and take jurisdiction in every such appeal. Pending the decision of said appeal the commission may suspend the decision or order appealed from for such a period as it may deem fair and reasonable under the circumstances: Provided, That no appeal, unless the court or the commission shall so order, shall operate to stay any order of the commission: And provided further, That said commission shall not, nor shall any of its members, officers, agents, or employees, be taxed with any costs, nor shall they or any of them be required to give any supersedeas bond or security for costs or damages on any appeal whatsoever. Said commission, or any of its members, officers, agents, or employees, shall not be liable to suit or action or for any judgment or decree for any damages, loss, or injury claimed by any public utility or person, nor required in any case to make any deposit for costs or pay for any service to the clerks of any court or to the marshal of the United States.

"PAR. 65. That every proceeding, action, or suit to set aside, vacate, or amend any determination or order of the commission, or to enjoin the enforcement thereof, or to prevent in any way such order or determination from becoming effective, shall be commenced, and every appeal to the courts or right of recourse to the courts shall be taken or exercised, within 120 days after the entry or rendition of such order or determination, and the right to commence any such action, proceeding, or suit, or to take or exercise any such appeal or right of recourse to the courts, shall terminate absolutely at the end of such 120 days.

"PAR. 66. That no injunction shall issue suspending or staying any order of the commission, except upon application to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or a judge thereof, and only upon notice to the commission and after hearing had.

"PAR. 67. That if upon trial of such proceeding or suit evidence shall be introduced by the plaintiff which is found by the court to be different from that offered upon the hearing before the commission or its authorized agent, or additional thereto, the court, before proceeding to render judgment, unless the parties to such action stipulate in writing to the contrary, shall transmit a copy of such evidence to the commission, and shall stay further proceedings in said proceeding for 15 days from the date of such transmission. Upon the receipt of such evidence the commission shall consider the same and may alter, modify, amend, or rescind its order relating to such valuation, rate or rates, tolls, charges, schedules, joint rate or rates, time schedules, regulations, act, or service complained of in said action, and shall report its action thereon to said court within 10 days from receipt of such evidence.

"PAR. 68. That if the commission shall rescind its order complained of the proceeding or suit shall be dismissed; if it shall alter, modify, or amend the same, such altered, modified, or amended order shall take the place of the original order complained of and judgment shall be rendered thereon as though made by the commission in the first instance. If the original order shall not be rescinded or changed by the commission, judgment shall be rendered upon such original order, and costs shall be taxed as may be deemed proper under the circumstances.

"PAR. 69. That in all trials, actions, and proceedings arising under the provisions of this section or growing out of the exercise of the authority and powers granted herein to the commission, the burden of proof shall be upon the party adverse to such commission or seeking to set aside any determination, requirement, direction, or order of said commission to show by clear and satisfactory evidence that the determination, requirement, direction, or order of the commission complained of is inadequate, unreasonable, or unlawful, as the case may be.

"PAR. 70. That no person shall be excused from testifying or from producing books, accounts, and papers in any proceeding based upon or growing out of any violation of the provisions of this section, on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to penalty or forfeiture; but no person having so testified shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may have testified or produced any documentary evidence: Provided, That no person so testifying shall be exempted from prosecution or punishment for perjury: Provided further, That the immunity hereby conferred shall extend only to a natural person who, in obedience to a subpœna, gives testimony under oath or produces evidence, documentary or otherwise, under oath.

"PAR. 71. That upon application of any person the commission shall furnish certified copies, under the seal of the commission, of any order made by it, which shall be prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein.

"PAR. 72. That the power to create liens on corporate property by public utilities in the District of Columbia is hereby declared to be a special privilege, the right of supervision, regulation, restriction, and control of which is hereby vested in the public utilities commission of the District of Columbia, and such power shall be exercised according to the provisions of this section.

"PAR. 73. That no public utility shall hereafter issue any stocks, stock certificates, bonds, mortgages, or any other evidences of indebtedness payable in more than one year from date, until it shall have first obtained the certificate of the commission showing authority for such issue from the commission.

"PAR. 74. That no public utility shall issue any stocks, certificates of stock, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness for money, property, or services, either directly or indirectly, nor shall it receive any money, property, or services in payment of the same, either directly or indirectly, until there shall have been recorded upon the books of such public utility the certificate of the commission in this section provided for.

"PAR. 75. That no public utility shall declare any stock, bond, or scrip dividend or divide the proceeds of the sale of any stock, bond, or scrip among its stockholders.

"PAR. 76. That no public utility shall issue any stocks, certificates of stock, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness secured on its property in the District of Columbia for the purpose of any reorganization or consolidation in excess of the total amount of the stocks, certificates of stock, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness then outstanding against the public utilities so reorganizing or consolidating, and no such public utility shall purchase the property of any other public utility for the purpose of effecting a consolidation until the commission shall have determined and set forth in writing that said consolidation will be in the public interest, nor until the commission shall have approved in writing the terms upon which said consolidation shall be made.

"PAR. 77. That no public utility shall apply the proceeds of any such stock, certificates of stock, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness to any other purpose or issue the same on any less favorable terms than that specified in the certificate issued by the commission.

"PAR. 78. That all stocks, certificates of stock, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness issued contrary to the provisions of this section shall be void.

"PAR. 79. That any public utility, or any agent, director, or officer thereof, who shall, directly or indirectly, issue or cause to be issued any stocks, certificates of stock, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness contrary to the provisions of this section, or who shall apply the proceeds from the sale thereof to any purposes other than that specified in the certificate of the commission, shall forfeit and pay into the Treasury of the United States, one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia, not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000 for each offense.

"PAR. 80. That each and every director, president, secretary, or other official of any such public utility who shall make any false statement to secure the issue of any stock, certificate of stock, bond, mortgage, or other evidence of indebtedness, or who shall, by false statement knowingly made, procure of the commission the making of the certificate herein provided, or issue, with knowledge of such fraud, negotiate, or cause to be negotiated, any such stock, certificate of stock, bond, mortgage, or other evidence of indebtedness in violation of this section, shall be guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term of not less than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"PAR. 81. That if any public utility or any agent or officer thereof shall, directly or indirectly, by any device whatsoever, or otherwise, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person, firm, or corporation a greater or less compensation for any service rendered or to be rendered by it in or affecting or relating to the conduct of a street railroad or street railroad corporation, common carrier, gas plant, gas corporation, electric plant, electric corporation, water power company, telephone line, telephone corporation, telegraph line, or telegraph corporation, or pipe line company, or to the production, transmission, delivery, or furnishing of heat, light, water, or power, or the conveyance of telephone or telegraph messages, or for any service in connection therewith than that prescribed in the public schedules or tariffs then in force or established as provided herein, or than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person, firm, or corporation other than one conducting a like business for a like and contemporaneous service, such public utility shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be a misdemeanor and unlawful, and upon conviction thereof shall forfeit and pay to the District of Columbia not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 for each offense; and such agent or officer so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $100 for each offense.

"PAR. 82. That it shall be unlawful for any public utility to demand, charge, collect, or receive from any person, firm, or corporation less compensation for any service rendered or to be rendered by said public utility in consideration of the furnishing by said person, firm, or corporation of any part of the facilities incident thereto: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as prohibiting any public utility from renting any facilities incident to the production, transmission, delivery, or furnishing of heat, light, water, or power, or the supply of any liquid, steam, or air, through pipes or tubing, or the conveyance of telegraph or telephone messages, and paying a reasonable rental therefor; or as requiring any public utility to furnish any part of such appliances which are situated in and upon the premises of any consumer or user, except telephone station equipment upon the subscriber's premises, and, unless otherwise ordered by the commission, meters, and appliances for measurements of any product or service.

"PAR. 83. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect to any service in or affecting or relating to any public utility or the production, transmission, delivery, or furnishing of heat, light, water, or power, or any liquid, steam, or air, or the conveying of telegraph or telephone messages within the District of Columbia, or for any service in connection therewith whereby any such service shall, by any device whatsoever or otherwise, be rendered free or at a less rate than that named in the schedules and tariffs in force as provided in this section, or whereby any service or advantage is received other than is in this section specified. Any person, firm, or corporation violating the provisions of this paragraph shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 for each offense.

"PAR. 84. That any officer, agent, or employee of any public utility who shall fail or refuse to fill out and return any blanks, as required by this section, or shall fail or refuse to answer any question therein propounded, or shall knowingly or willfully give a false answer to any such question, or shall evade the answer to any such question where the fact inquired of is within his knowledge, or who shall, upon proper demand, fail or refuse to exhibit to the commission or any commissioner, or any person authorized to examine the same, any book, paper, account, record, or memoranda of such public utility which is in his possession or under his control, or who shall fail to properly use and keep his system of accounting, or any part thereof, as prescribed by the commission under this section, or who shall refuse to do any act or thing in connection with such system of accounting when so directed by the commission or its authorized representative shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction theerof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 for each offense, and a penalty of not less than $500 nor more than $2,000 shall, on conviction, be imposed on the public utility for each such offense when such officer, agent, or employee acted in obedience to the direction, construction, or request of such public utility or any general officer thereof.

"PAR. 85. That if any public utility shall violate any provision of this section, or shall do any act herein prohibited, or shall fail or refuse to perform any duty enjoined upon it for which a penalty has not been provided, or shall fail, neglect, or refuse to obey any lawful requirement or order made by the commission, or any judgment or decree made by any court upon its application, for every such violation, failure, or refusal such public utility shall forfeit and pay to the District of Columbia the sum of $200 for each such offense. In construing and enforcing the provisions of this paragraph, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any public utility acting within the scope of his employment and instructions shall in every case be deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such public utility.

"PAR. 86. That any person who shall destroy, injure, or interfere with any apparatus or appliance owned or operated by or in charge of the commission or its agents shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by fine not exceeding $100 or imprisonment for a period not exceeding 30 days, or both.

"PAR. 87. That every day during which any public utility, or any officer, agent, or employee thereof, shall fail knowingly or willfully to observe and comply with any order or direction of the commission, or to perform any duty enjoined by this section, shall constitute a separate and distinct violation of such order, or direction, or of this section, as the case may be.

"PAR. 88. That whenever, after hearing and investigation as provided in this section, the commission shall find that any rate, toll, charge, regulation, or practice of any public utility within the District of Columbia is unreasonable or discriminatory, it shall have the power to regulate, fix, and determine the same as provided in this section.

"PAR. 89. That every public utility shall, whenever an accident attended with loss of human life or personal injury without loss of human life occurs within the District of Columbia, upon its premises, or directly or indirectly arising from or connected with its maintenance or operation, give immediate notice thereof to the commission. In the event of any such accident, the commission, if it deem the public interest requires it, shall cause an investigation to be made forthwith.

"PAR. 90. That the commission shall inquire into any neglect or violation of the laws or regulations in force in the District of Columbia by any public utility doing business therein, or by the officers, agents, or employees thereof, or by any person operating the plant of any public utilty, and shall have the power, and it shall be its duty, to enforce the provisions of this section as well as all other laws relating to public utilities.

"PAR. 91. That the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia shall be the general counsel of the commission and shall receive from and be paid out of the appropriations provided and to be provided for the expenses of the commission in addition to his compensation otherwise provided by law the sum of $1,000 per annum, payable in equal monthly installments. It shall be the duty of the general counsel to represent and appear for the commission in all actions and proceedings involving any question under this section, or under or in reference to any act, order, or proceeding of the commission, and if directed to do so by the commission, to intervene, if possible, in any action or proceeding in which any such question is involved; to commence and prosecute all actions and proceedings directed or authorized by the commission, and to expedite, in every way possible, final and just determination of all such actions and proceedings; to advise the commission and each commissioner, when so requested, in regard to all matters in connection with the powers and duties of the commission and of the members thereof, and generally to perform all duties and services as attorney and counsel to the commission which the commission may reasonably require of him. The assistants to the corporation counsel shall perform such duties relating to matters arising under this section and all other matters as the corporation counsel may prescribe. The commission may, if at any time it deems necessary, employ other attorneys at law as additional assistants to the said general counsel for the performance of such extraordinary legal services for or in behalf of the commission at such special compensation for such additional assistants as the commission may prescribe, which said compensation shall be paid out of the appropriations herein provided and hereafter to be provided for the expenses of the commission. The said corporation counsel and any of his assistants designated by him or by the commission shall have the right to appear and prosecute any civil, quasi criminal, or criminal case to recover any penalty, forfeiture, fine, or for the imposition of any punishment provided for in this section whether instituted by or on behalf of the United States of America or by or on behalf of the District of Columbia or otherwise, and on every appeal provided by law. The commission may enforce its orders in any case by mandamus or other legal or equitable remedy in any court of competent jurisdiction, and it shall be the duty of the corporation counsel or his assistants to represent the commission in every such proceeding.

"PAR. 92. That the provisions of this section shall be interpreted and construed liberally in order to accomplish the purposes thereof, and where any specific power or authority is given the commission by the provisions of this section the enumeration thereof shall not be held to exclude or impair any power or authority otherwise in this section conferred on said commission. The commission hereby created shall have, in addition to the powers in this section specified, mentioned, and indicated all additional, implied and incidental power which may be proper and necessary to effect and carry out, perform, and execute all the said powers herein specified, mentioned, and indicated. A substantial compliance with the requirements of this section shall be sufficient to give effect to all the rules, orders, acts, and regulations of the commission, and they shall not be declared inoperative, illegal, or void for any omission of a technical nature in respect thereto. That each paragraph of this section, and every part of each paragraph, are hereby declared to be independent paragraphs, and the holding of any paragraph or paragraphs or part or parts thereof to be void, ineffective, or unconstitutional for any cause shall not be deemed to affect any other paragraph or part thereof.

"PAR. 93. That this section shall not have the effect to release or waive any right of action by the United States, or by the District of Columbia, or by any person, for any right, penalty, or forfeiture which may have arisen or which may hereafter arise under any law of the United States or any regulation in force in the District of Columbia; and all penalties and forfeitures accruing under this section shall be cumulative, and a suit for any recovery of one shall not be a bar to the recovery of any other penalty.

"PAR. 94. That, first, unless the commission shall otherwise order, it shall be unlawful for any public utility within the District of Columbia to demand, collect, or receive a greater compensation for any service than the charge fixed on the lowest schedules of rates for the same service under the law in force at the date of the passage of this section; second, every public utility in the District of Columbia shall, within 30 days after the passage and publication of this section, file in the office of the commission copies of all schedules of rates and charges, including joint rates, in force at the date of the passage of this section; third, any public utility desiring to advance or discontinue any such rate or rates may make application to the commission in writing, stating the advance in or discontinuance of the rate or rates desired, giving the reasons for such advance or discontinuance; fourth, upon receiving such application the commission shall fix a time and place for hearing, and give such notice to interested parties as shall be proper and reasonable; if, after such hearing and investigation, the commission shall find that the change or discontinuance applied for is reasonable, fair, and just, it shall grant the application, either in whole or in part; fifth, any public utility being dissatisfied with any order of the commission made under the provisions of this paragraph may commence a proceeding against it in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in the manner as is in this section hereinbefore provided, which action shall be tried and determined in the same manner as is in this section hereinbefore provided.

"PAR. 95. The commission shall have the power in each and every instance to employ and to prescribe the duties of such officers, clerks, stenographers, typewriters, inspectors, experts, and employees as it may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this section, and to fix and pay their compensation within the appropriations provided by Congress. The commission is hereby authorized, within the appropriation made by Congress, to incur and pay incidental expenses for postage, printing, blanks, books, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, stationery, binding, rebinding, repairing and preservation of records, desks, office furniture and supplies, traveling expenses of the commission, the commissioners, and every officer, agent, and employee thereof, and all other general expenses reasonably necessary to be incurred in carrying out the purposes of this section. All payments and disbursements, as provided in this section, shall be made by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia upon proper vouchers, certified as required by the commission; and the commission is hereby also granted power and authority to designate and appoint during its pleasure such officers, clerks, inspectors, and employees of the District of Columbia and members of the Metropolitan force of the District of Columbia to perform any of the duties which the commission may from time to time, respectively, assign to them, and to employ any assistance and fix compensation therefor within the limits of the appropriations for its use herein or hereafter made by act of Congress.

"PAR. 96. That the said commission shall hereafter exercise all the powers and have all the authority now vested by law in the Interstate Commerce Commission by virtue and under the act of Congress approved May 23, 1908, entitled 'An act authorizing certain extensions to be made of the lines of the Anacostia & Potomac River Railroad Co., the Washington Railway & Electric Co., the City & Suburban Railway of Washington, and the Capital Traction Co., of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' and said power and authority shall no longer be exercised by said Interstate Commerce Commission: Provided, That the orders, rules, and regulations made by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall continue to be in force until changed, repealed, altered, or amended by the commission created by this section, which said commission is hereby given power and jurisdiction to issue and, at its pleasure, to revoke all permits, or licenses, to carry this section into effect, and its rules and regulations shall be valid and binding on all public-service corporations and on all persons.

"Whenever the commission shall be of opinion, after hearing had upon its own motion or upon complaint, that repairs, improvements, or changes in any street railroad, gas plant, electric plant, telephone line, telegraph line, pipe line, water-power plant, or the facilities of any common carrier ought reasonably to be made, or that any addition of service or equipment ought reasonably to be made thereto, or that the vehicles or cars of any street railroad or common carrier are unclean, insanitary, uncomfortable, inconvenient, or improperly equipped, operated, or maintained, or are in need of paint, or unsightly in appearance, or that any addition ought reasonably to be made thereto in order to promote the comfort or convenience of the public or employees, or in order to secure adequate service or facilities, the commission shall have power to make and serve an order directing that such repairs, improvements, changes, or additions to service or equipment be made within a reasonable time and in a manner to be specified therein, and every such public utility is hereby required and directed to obey every such order of the commission.

"PAR. 97. That all the powers created by this section and the duty of carrying this section into effect and enforcing the provisions thereof are hereby vested in and imposed on the Commissioners of the District of Columbia as a governmental and administrative agency, and said powers shall be exercised and said duties performed as additional and superadded powers to their powers and duties as Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The powers, authority, and duties hereby imposed on and granted said commissioners shall be permanent and are hereby imposed on and granted to the present Commissioners of the District of Columbia and their successors in office. The commission created by this section shall, so soon as convenient after its passage, organize by electing one of its number as chairman, who shall serve until the first Monday in January, 1914. On the first Monday in January in each odd-numbered year the commissioners shall meet and elect a chairman, who shall serve for two years and until his successor is elected. A majority of said commissioners shall constitute a quorum to do business, and any vacancy shall not impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission. Any investigation, inquiry, or hearing within the powers of the commission may be made or held by any commissioner, whose acts and orders, when approved by the commission, shall be deemed to be the order of the commission. The commission shall have power to adopt and publish rules to govern its proceedings and to regulate the mode and manner of all investigations and hearings pertaining to public utilities.

"No commissioner shall be directly or indirectly interested in any public utility or in any stock, bond, mortgage, security, or contract of any such public utility; and if any such commissioner shall voluntarily become so interested his office shall ipso facto become vacant; and if any such commissioner shall become so interested otherwise than voluntarily he shall, within a reasonable time, divest himself of such interest, and if he fails so to do his office shall become vacant. Before entering upon the duties of his office each commissioner, the secretary of the commission, the counsel of the commission, and every employee of said commission shall take and subscribe the constitutional oath of office, and shall in addition thereto make oath or affirmation before and file with the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia that he is not pecuniarily interested, voluntarily or involuntarily, in any public utility in the District of Columbia or elsewhere.

"PAR. 98. That the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to carry out the provisions of this section, one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and all moneys received from fines, forfeitures, and penalties shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia.

"PAR. 99. That all the duties, powers, and authority of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall continue and remain in full force and effect notwithstanding this section; and all powers, authority, and duties of the municipality known as the District of Columbia and all rights vested in said municipality shall continue and remain in full force and effect notwithstanding this section. All the lawful ordinances and regulations made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia as such, and all other lawful municipal ordinances and regulations, shall continue and remain in full force and effect, and may be altered, changed, or amended, and new ordinances and regulations may be made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, acting as such, hereafter, notwithstanding this section: Provided, That when any order of the commission created by this section shall be made which shall be inconsistent and repugnant to any municipal ordinance or regulation, or any ordinance or regulation made or to be made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, acting as such, then and in such event the order of the commission created by this section shall be given full force and effect, notwithstanding such municipal ordinance or regulation.

"PAR. 100. That the board of directors of every public utility shall consist of not more than 15 nor less than 7 members, within which limitation the membership may be in any case increased or diminished, as the stockholders may from time to time determine.

"PAR. 101. That, except as modified or changed by this section and until modified or changed under its provisions, all charters, statutes, laws, ordinances, and regulations now in force shall remain and continue to be in full force and effect until altered, amended, or repealed according to law: Provided, That all charters, statutes, acts, and parts of acts, laws, ordinances, and regulations inconsistent and repugnant to the provisions of this section, and only so far as inconsistent and repugnant thereto, are hereby repealed.

"PAR. 102. That this section shall not affect pending actions or proceedings, civil or criminal, or quasi criminal, but the same may be prosecuted or defended as heretofore provided by law or regulation.

"PAR. 103. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this section."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 132: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 132, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In lines 8 and 9 of paragraph 6, on page 11, of said amendment strike out the words "midnight and 7 o'clock in the morning" and insert in lieu thereof the words "1 o'clock a. m. and 7 o'clock a. m."; and in line 14 of said paragraph, after the word "hotel," insert the word ", restaurant"; and the House agree to the same.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, March 2, 1913.

(Continuation of legislative day of Saturday, March 1, 1913.)

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. Sunday, March 2, the House resumed its session.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY POPULAR VOTE.

The SPEAKER announced that he had received a letter from the secretary of state of Wisconsin, announcing that the legislature of that State had ratified the proposed amendment to the Constitution for the election of Senators by popular vote.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. This morning at 1 o'clock when we took a recess there was a motion pending which had been seconded. Will that motion to suspend the rules be the unfinished business as soon as we reach that particular order of business, or as soon as we dispose of conference reports?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule that, barring conference reports and appropriation bills, the gentleman's motion is the unfinished business.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe that is right.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I am recorded as being present on the vote for the closing of traffic on Pennsylvania Avenue during the suffrage parade. I would like to vote "aye," as I voted under a misapprehension.

The SPEAKER. That is not permissible. The gentleman can make an explanation in the RECORD.

Mr. BERGER. I would like to get unanimous consent to change my vote to "aye," because I voted under a misapprehension. I understood it was a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman can get unanimous consent, he can make his explanation in the RECORD.

Mr. BERGER. I ask unanimous consent to print an explanation in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. When the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 28812) was under consideration there was a provision relative to allowing 50 per cent increase of pay for a certain number of officers who qualify as aviators and actually fly. During the debate it was stated that we would endeavor to keep the two services on a parity. The Army bill at that time provided for a 50 per cent increase, and it was so provided in the naval bill. Since then, in conference, the Army bill has been modified, and as the conference report was adopted last night it provides for an increase of 35 per cent instead of 40 per cent. The House passed the naval bill, allowing an increase of 50 per cent for the Navy, and the Senate did not change the text. I ask unanimous consent of the House to have that matter corrected in conference, so that we may make it 35 per cent increase instead of 50 per cent increase.

Mr. MANN. That is to carry out the understanding that we had at the time the bill passed?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and made on the floor. I said that I would endeavor to keep it the same in the naval service as in the military service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the conferees be permitted to change the 50 per cent increase to 35 per cent in the item relating to aviators in the naval bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

62-63	58	Mississippi River Commission. Senate amendments strike out House item extending the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission over levee construction to Rock Island, Ill., and inserts provision for examination and survey from Cape Girardeau, Mo., to Rock Island, Ill., with a view to such improvements as will at the same time promote navigation, develop water power, and protect property adjacent to said river from damage by floods, consideration being given and recommendations made as to plans for cooperation by the localities affected; and for the purpose of such examination and for the building of such levees between said points upon the river in aid of navigation, as may be found necessary or desirable by the commission, and approved by the Chief of Engineers, the sum of $200,000 is provided. S. M. SPARKMAN,
JOS. E. RANSDELL,
GEO. P. LAWRENCE,
Managers on the part of the House.

During the reading,

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOSTER. Are the amendments as numbered and read from the Clerk's desk the same as in the bill which passed the Senate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida can answer that question.

Mr. SPARKMAN. They are.

Mr. FOSTER. They do not seem to correspond in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The amendments have not been printed separately, have they?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not separately from the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. They are numbered in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The last amendment read was No. 35, on page 31.

The Clerk completed the reading of the statement.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to have the gentleman from Florida make a statement.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, the people and the commercial interests of the country, I think, are to be congratulated on the fact that we are rapidly approaching a point in the proceedings here where this bill is to finally pass this body, and I hope to become a law. [Applause.]

It would be a great misfortune if this bill were to fail of becoming a law, as it would cause all work on projects now under improvement to stop, which in turn would result in great injury to the commerce of the country, besides adding much to the cost of the works. It may be said that this bill carries an unduly large sum of money.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In a moment I will yield. I admit that this bill is large as compared with some of our river and harbor bills, somewhat larger than I had hoped when we began its preparation; but to anyone who may desire to criticize it on that account I wish to say that if the amount is large, our necessities for the work it is to carry on are great, and no more important measure will pass Congress at this session. There is no more important work to the commerce of the country than the work for which these appropriations provide.

I have heretofore said the bill is not an unduly large one when compared with other measures. It is true that the last bill—the bill of 1912—was somewhat smaller than this, but that only provided for half the time this bill is to cover. Then again, we have had much larger river and harbor bills than the present.

Mr. COX. Has any river and harbor bill ever been any larger than this?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; the bill of 1907 amounted to between $80,000,000 and $90,000,000, and that, too, following the bill of 1905, with only two years intervening. And when that fact is considered in connection with the further fact that this bill is to cover more than half the period that intervened between the bill of 1905 and 1907, it will readily appear that this is not an extravagant bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In a moment. I wish to say further that the commerce of the country has grown, and the necessities for these appropriations have increased in a greater ratio than have the appropriations themselves. In short, Mr. Speaker, if we take the growth and development of the commerce of the country as a criterion, our river and harbor bills have not been as large as they might have been. And yet I hope and believe we are now reaching a point, as I have said before, when we may reasonably expect these bills will grow less and less until they reach a satisfactory minimum.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I hope the gentleman will understand in the questions I am going to ask that I have no desire to be personally offensive. I will ask the gentleman if he knows when this bill passes, with the others in prospect, what the aggregate expenditures of appropriations will be for the fiscal year 1914?

Mr. SPARKMAN. With all of the other bills that will pass this body and become laws?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have not the figures before me, but I have understood that the aggregate will perhaps go beyond, a little beyond, the billion-dollar mark.

Mr. LEWIS. Is that as definite as the gentleman can make it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is about as definite as I can make it, as I have not the exact figures before me.

Mr. LEWIS. I will ask the gentleman this question: Does he know what the revenues of the Government will be in the year 1914?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know, but I have no doubt but that the revenues will be ample to meet all of the expenditures that this Congress will authorize.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the gentleman if he will yield me five minutes during the time allowed for consideration of this subject?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly; I will be glad to do so.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to inquire of the gentleman whether this bill as finally submitted to the House contains any appropriation for the construction or repair of levees on the Mississippi River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; in a sense. There is a large sum of money appropriated for the lower Mississippi River. To be exact, $6,000,000 are appropriated for the purpose of revetment work, some of which may be used for levee work, provided the Mississippi River Commission and the Chief of Engineers shall find that the construction or the repair of levees in a given case will be in the interest of navigation.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly the point. In other words, as I understand it, this bill carries no appropriation either for construction or repair of levees on the Mississippi River, unless the Mississippi River Commission shall first decide that such construction is necessary in the interest of navigation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Mississippi River Commission and the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is confined to that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. COVINGTON. In line with the inquiry made by the gentleman from Georgia, is it not a fact that Senate amendment 61 goes further than the river and harbor legislation has ever gone in recent years in the recoguition of a specific revetment project on the Mississippi River without any discretion to the Mississippi River Commisson? That amendment reads:

Provided further, That of the amount herein appropriated, $100,000, or such sum as may be necessary, shall be expended for revetting and otherwise improving the right bank of said river at and near Helena, Ark., for the purpose of preventing a breach in the levee by the caving of the bank at that point and for promoting the interest of navigation.

I am an advocate of river and harbor improvements. I believe this country ought to embrace the opportunity to enlarge the scope of its interstate commerce by waterways, but I am not one of those who, even for my own waterways, am willing to embark this country on the wild proposition that land subject to floods throughout the United States shall be reclaimed at the expense of the Federal Government on the basis of the misleading idea that it may be in the interest of navigation. I want to ask the gentleman, therefore, to answer my question.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand it to go any further. Certainly it was not the intention of the conference committee that it should.

Mr. COVINGTON. Does it not take that particular revetment project at Helena, Ark., away from the discretion of the Mississippi River Commission and fix that locality as one where the levees must be improved whether the commission shall approve it or not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; it does not go quite to that extent. I would like to say to the gentleman that, in the first place, I do not favor these allotments. When, for instance, a lump sum is appropriated for the improvement of a stream, the amount to be expended as the engineers think best, I do not as a rule favor the allotment of a portion of that money by congressional action to a particular portion of the stream. I think that a bad practice. Some years ago that was a very common practice, but in more recent years we have been trying to get away from it, so that the last three or four bills have not, I believe, carried such items. This amendment, however, was placed in the bill in the Senate, and it was found very difficult, if not impossible, to eliminate it and get the bill out of conference. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me for just a moment——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SPARKMAN (continuing). I sympathize with the gentleman's views upon it, and I want to say that I would be one of the last Members of this House——

Mr. COVINGTON. I believe that——

Mr. SPARKMAN. To favor the indiscriminate building of levees or the building of levees anywhere or in any manner for the sole protection of private property. I think that is not one of our functions and is beyond our jurisdiction.

Mr. COVINGTON. Let me ask one more question. Is not this the first time that there has been taken away from the Mississippi River Commission the issue of fact as to a particular location which it does or does not regard as a necessary place for levee-improvement work?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman places a construction upon this amendment I do not believe the phraseology justifies, but I will answer by saying that in years gone by it was the practice on the Mississippi River for Congress, in providing a lump sum for the improvement of the river, to specify places where certain amounts should be spent at given points up and down that stream. As I said a moment ago, we have been trying to get away from that custom, because it is a practice I do not believe in myself.

Mr. COVINGTON. The construction the chairman puts on that matter is different from mine. He also certainly knows that in recent years no such practice has obtained.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Just a moment. I will further say to the gentleman and to the House that the Government is already doing revetment work there, and the Senator who offered the amendment, thinking, no doubt, that it was not going on fast enough, has sought to hasten it, but I think the provision is sufficiently guarded. It says—but first let me explain.

If the gentleman will read further back in that paragraph, he will find the qualification to which I called attention a while ago, that no money can be expended for the building of revetments, for the construction or repair of levees, except such work is found to be in the interest of navigation. Now, bearing that in mind, I will read the proviso:

Provided further, That of the amount herein appropriated, $100,000, or such sum as may be necessary, shall be expended for revetting and otherwise improving the right bank of said river at and near Helena, Ark., for the purpose of preventing a breach in the levee by the caving of the bank at that point and for promoting the interest of navigation.

Now, the work already undertaken there, as well as the allotment, is based upon the theory that the construction or the repair of this levee is in the interest of navigation. The whole paragraph shows this very conclusively.

Mr. COVINGTON. Now, as a matter of fact, is not the primary purpose of the expenditure of this money to repair and rebuild the levees at and near Helena, Ark., and thereby safeguard from occasional floods the land at that locality, and not to create and preserve the channel at that place on the Mississippi River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think not. It is not the intention of this House——

Mr. COVINGTON. It is not the intention of this House to permit such specific designation for Mississippi River levee work. I agree to that.

Mr. SPARKMAN (continuing). Nor of our committee, if my friend will permit me. Of course, we leave the expenditure to the discretion of the Mississippi River Commission and the Chief of Engineers, taking it for granted that they will not abuse that discretion, and I do not believe they will. It is understood that confining the waters in the river within narrow limits is, to a certain extent, in the interest of navigation, because it prevents, to some extent, the washing of the river banks into the stream and also reduces cut-offs and the making of new channels, which might, and doubtless would, interfere very materially with navigation. Now, as to the details, I understand that when the Mississippi River Commission thinks it advisable to spend money at a given place they usually arrange with parties and localities interested upon a basis for participation, the extent of this participation varying, of course, in proportion to the navigable interests to be conserved. Of course, private property may be benefited, but the Government only looks to the interests of commerce and navigation.

Mr. COVINGTON. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, how much was carried in the river and harbor bill of 1912, the act that was approved July 25, 1912, for similar purposes on the Mississippi River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Six millions of dollars, as I remember.

Mr. COVINGTON. Six millions of dollars in that bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not solely for that purpose.

Mr. COVINGTON. There is carried in this bill for a similar purpose another $6,000,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. COVINGTON. The last preceding bill, the act of 1912, carried $5,000,000 or $6,000,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not so much as that. About three and one-half or four millions of dollars.

Mr. COVINGTON. About $4,000,000 as it finally came back from the Senate and became law. What is to-day the tonnage on the Mississippi River below St. Louis?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, it is perhaps small as compared with the amount of money that is being spent there.

Mr. COVINGTON. I would like to ask if the chairman can tell me what all the tonnage is on the Mississippi River below St. Louis.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have it here, stated in this way: Between Cairo and Memphis, 1,857,616 tons; between Memphis and Vicksburg, 1,910,854 tons; and between Vicksburg and New Orleans, 2,426,376 tons; making in all more than 5,000,000 tons of commerce for the last fiscal year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For what year?

Mr. SPARKMAN. For the fiscal year 1911.

Mr. COVINGTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, the result of that policy is that, theoretically for navigation, but, as I contend, really for so-called land reclamation, there has been appropriated in the last three years $15,000,000 for the Mississippi River to safeguard commerce of less than 4,000,000 tons annually. Is not that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No. I said upward of 5,000,000 tons there.

Mr. COVINGTON. In other words, more than $1 per ton has been expended in the last three years in order theoretically to create and maintain adequate channels on the Mississippi for that tonnage?

Mr. EDWARDS. The gentleman loses sight of the fact that it is not the only commerce there affected, but the commerce of a great section of country is affected. The commerce does not go down the river, but the freight rate is affected.

Mr. COVINGTON. I want to be perfectly fair with the gentleman. I do not purpose to object to the passage of this bill. But I do want to draw to the attention of this House at this time the scheme we are about to enter upon in order that they may more carefully safeguard in the future the Treasury in regard to a reclamation policy embodied in the river and harbor act. The Mississippi River is, I recognize, a national waterway project, but its varied problems ought to be in the hands of experts, and a senatorial raid on a river and harbor bill for a particular point ought to be impossible.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I sympathize with that idea, but I want to say——

Mr. HOBSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Just let me finish.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON]?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In just a moment I will. I think this is a very important subject on which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] has touched. But I want to say to him that we are not now embarking upon that policy. Whatever embarkation has taken place was begun many years ago. We are only at this time following up that policy, for the Congress began to make these appropriations some 30 years ago. About three years ago we embarked in earnest on the policy of revetting the banks of the Mississippi River. We thought then it would cost about $90,000,000, and we expected to complete it in about 20 years. Now it is estimated that it is going to cost a good deal more than ninety millions.

Mr. COX. How much more, does the gentleman think?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Perhaps $156,000,000 or $157,000,000, or something like that. At least, the estimates reach those figures.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, Mr. AUSTIN, and Mr. HOBSON rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not yield to anybody just yet. I want to finish the statement I am making.

There is a way to treat this great problem outside of the river and harbor bill.

All the great political parties of the country have committed themselves to the improvement of the lower Mississippi; in fact, the entire Mississippi River. Have segregated it, so to speak, from among the other rivers of the country, placing it in a class by itself. Now, the thing to do is to treat it separately; in a separate measure, where all interests may be considered and an equitable basis for participation by localities and private parties provided.

Now, right here and in this connection I wish to speak of another matter. The charge is made and reiterated from time to time and from year to year that these rivers and harbors bills are "pork-barrel" measures; that they are framed and the appropriation distributed so as to gain votes. This charge I have combated before, as have others, but apparently without effect. Still I will say again that the appropriations are not made or distributed on any such basis, or for any such purpose. No appropriation was placed in the bill by the House committee or by the House except upon a project with estimates by the engineers, and no appropriation has been made except it was shown to be in the interest of commerce and navigation. If there is any politics back of these bills and the appropriations they carry, it begins with the conventions of the national parties, where in each one for the past several years they have committed themselves not only to the improvement of the Mississippi River and to the expenditure of these large sums of money upon it, but also to the most liberal policy toward river and harbor improvement generally. Now, I suppose these declarations and committals are made for the purpose of influencing voters, but this all comes from the strong and irresistible sentiment in favor of that class of work. If there were no demand for river and harbor work, there would be no platform declarations in favor of it. To that extent perhaps there is politics in it, but no further.

Mr. AUSTIN. Was not the Democratic platform stronger than any other platform on this subject?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, it was strong; quite strong. I will tell you what ought to be done with this—

Mr. COVINGTON. Should it not be treated on a separate bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; as I have just said, in a special bill reported to this House, and the proposition put square up to the Members, all of whom are committed by their party platform to that class of improvement. Let them say whether or not they want to do it. It is going to cost several hundred million dollars, but if the parties mean what they say, then Congress will act; will find the money. But let us do it in a separate bill, outside of the rivers and harbors bill.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. I want to ask the chairman, in connection with the investigations as to the improvement of the Mississippi River, whether the present status of engineering projects for the protection against inundation is satisfactory? I have in mind particularly a proposition for a second line of levees—back, removed from the first—which apparently would be built only in certain places to guarantee protection from the overflows that come with the increasing rise of the river.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman that I think every conceivable plan has been considered by the engineers, and they have never hit upon any better plan, in their judgment, than that which they are pursuing now for protection against floods, and that is a single line of levees on the flood side, whichever it may happen to be, and broad enough and high enough to keep the waters from going over.

Mr. HOBSON. Keeping it in its own narrow bed?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] withdraws his point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have one or two questions that I wanted to ask of the gentleman from Florida. The proposition to take over the Government control of water power, as it appeared in the Connecticut River dam bill, has been entirely eliminated from this bill and from the report?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Also in the case of the upper Mississippi River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; that has also been eliminated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Newlands general reclamation proposition has also been eliminated?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; it, too, has gone out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that the drainage of swamp areas and the irrigation of arid lands and the reclamation features have been taken out of the purview of the committee for the present?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, as to the question raised by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] with regard to the Mississippi River appropriation, I want to ask whether the Senate amendment No. 59, relating to the expenditure of money on the Mississippi River for the construction of levees, "to be considered only as emergency work," stands?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. It was embodied in the bill last year, and now the same provision is carried in this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, so far as the House is concerned, and the Senate, by the conference report, the Rivers and Harbors Committee does not yet take over to itself the control of water power?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It has not yet done so. I think that is a matter that ought to be thrashed out on this floor in a separate measure, not in a river and harbor bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The committee has not committed itself on that policy? That is open for further consideration?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, as to the construction of levees: During the discussion of the bill in the Committee of the Whole the gentleman will recall reference was made to the manner in which the bill was drawn; that it provided an appropriation of $6,000,000 for the construction of levees on the Mississippi River without regard to whether it was to be considered emergency work or not. The bill came into the House in that form.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is to say, that whereas the bill of 1912 provided that $6,000,000 should be appropriated for the purpose of rebuilding levees along the Mississippi River in view of the floods that had devastated the lower Mississippi River, therefore in the bill of 1913 $6,000,000 should be appropriated for the construction of levees without regard to whether floods occurred or not. That was the manner in which the bill came into the House, was it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is, in a measure, correct; but only a small part will likely go for levees.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, the Senate amendment restored the emergency clause, and induced the committee to bring back a bill which provides that the $6,000,000 appropriated this year, $12,000,000 altogether for the two years, shall still be regarded as emergency work. Is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct. The reason the House did not insert the provision that appeared in 1912 was because we thought the emergency had passed, but since that time there has been another flood and another break in the levees below Cairo and we deemed it proper to regard the work as emergency work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, so far as this legislation is concerned, we are still not committed to the policy of constructing levees along the Mississippi as a permanent proposition?

Mr. SPARKMAN. We are not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The committee has kept itself free in this instance with reference to the water power, and kept itself free from the proposition of constructing levees as a permanent duty of the Government.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to commend the committee for its protection of the committee and the House.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 30 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] five minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will say that for many years Congress has appropriated money for the construction of levees on the lower Mississippi. The language carried in the bill this year is identical with the language carried in all the other bills, and we have proceeded all along on the theory that this was emergency work. In other words, that the 8-hour law did not apply.

Now, last year the Supreme Court of the United States decided that this was not extraordinary emergency work in contemplation of the 8-hour statute. Therefore, when Congress made the appropriation of $6,000,000 we provided that that should be considered extraordinary emergency work, and for that reason relieved from the contemplation or limitation of the 8-hour law. That is all it did mean.

And so in this bill as it has come back from the Senate the same provision applies. My opinion of it is that the 8-hour limitation ought never to have applied, but the Supreme Court decided otherwise.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. We have just remodeled the 8-hour law.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Did it not contain some provision on this subject?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It did not except this work.

Mr. MANN. I thought it did.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There was one bill which did, but later that exception was repealed.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was accepted in conference.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, in answer to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] I want to quote for his benefit the Democratic platform on which he was elected to Congress and also the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX]——

Mr. COX. Was the gentleman from Mississippi a member of the platform committee that wrote it?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; I was not.

Mr. COX. Did not the gentleman have something to do with it, or with getting it in?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If I had written it, I would have made it even stronger.

Mr. COX. Then perhaps I would not have accepted it; I would not have stood for it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But the gentleman was elected on that platform and he will have to stand for it.

Mr. COX. We can repudiate a platform before we are elected, and the gentleman does not know but that I repudiated it on this point before I was elected.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will read the platform:

> We hold that the control of the Mississippi River is a national problem. The preservation of the depth of its water for the purpose of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel, and the prevention of the overflow of the land and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property impose an obligation which alone can be discharged by the General Government.

[Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman read the plank in the Republican platform?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I have not time; but the plank in the Republican platform declares for the same thing, and the plank in the Progressive platform declares for the same thing.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. MANN. In reference to the labor proposition, the conference report which has just been agreed to in the Senate and will be agreed to in the House on the eight-hour bill contains this provision:

> Provided, That nothing in this act shall apply or be construed to apply to persons employed in connection with dredging or rock excavation in any river or harbor of the United States or of the District of Columbia, while not directly operating dredging or rock-excavating machinery or tools, nor to persons engaged in the construction or repair of levees or revetments necessary for protection against floods or overflows on the navigable rivers of the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I am delighted to hear that. That report has come in within the last few minutes, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Now, whatever construction other gentlemen may have put upon the Democratic platform, I wish to read the construction put upon it and upon the obligations of the Democratic Party by a very distinguished Democrat of this country, who on day after to-morrow will become the President of the United States. [Applause.] I read from Gov. Wilson's speech accepting the nomination of the Democratic Party:

> In the case of the Mississippi River, that great central artery of our trade, it is plain that the Federal Government must build and maintain the levees and keep the great waters in harness for the general use.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I only wanted to put into the RECORD, in reply to criticisms which have been made by Democrats touching appropriations for the lower Mississippi River, a statement of what the Democratic platform and the candidate who was elected on that platform said on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time is up.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Stuart, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 132, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CURTIS, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. SMITH of Maryland as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RIVERS AND HARBORS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] three minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the reading of the report as agreed to by the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the rivers and harbors bill and notice scarcely any amendment placed on this bill by another body carrying appropriation but what has been agreed to by the managers on the part of the House. There are many items on this bill, in my judgment, that should have been stricken out, as it seems but a useless waste of money to attempt to improve a lot of rivers and harbors which will never afford any commerce whatever—at least so small as to be of no advantage to the people. It was hoped when this bill had passed the House and gone to another body that there these items might have been stricken from the bill and that all the money necessary for the proper improvement of rivers and harbors would have been provided and a good many million dollars saved to the Treasury of the United States. I am not opposed to reasonable appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and believe it is the duty of a Government to make ample provision to carry on this work, but I am opposed to the useless expenditure of millions of dollars that can be of no advantage to the people and for rivers that can never be made navigable to an extent as to be of any value to the people. When this bill was under consideration in the House many items were attempted to be stricken from the bill, but the effort proved unsuccessful, and so the bill now about to be enacted into law carries nearly $50,000,000 to improve the rivers and harbors besides the amount carried in the sundry civil bill, which will add $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 more. There were some legislative matters placed on this bill by another body which I am pleased to say were stricken out. Much objection of those living along the coasts has been made to the appropriation for the Mississippi River. Sometimes those who live along the coasts of the country have the idea—or, at least, it appears their vision reaches but little beyond the improvements that are made in their particular locality. They forget that out in the interior of the country and especially in the great Mississippi Valley which lies between the Alleghanies and the Rocky Mountains, there is a large extent of our country—I think the most fertile in the world—which produces thousands and hundreds of thousands and millions of tons of produce that must go to feed those people who live along the coast and afford a large part of their commerce, and without the exchange of products they would be unable to exist. And yet when we talk of an appropriation to take care of a great national problem like the Mississippi River men raise their voices and their hands in holy horror, for fear the National Government will be bankrupted because it is helping to control the floods of the Mississippi River. [Applause.]

For years and years, almost since the foundation of the Government, we have been improving rivers and harbors along the coast; and I am not objecting to that, Mr. Speaker, because I want to see our harbors along the coast properly improved, in order that they may take care of the commerce that comes from the interior of our country. But we who live a thousand miles or more from here feel that the National Government owes something to us in our struggles to take care of a problem which all political parties have declared to be a national problem. So I do not believe our friends along the coast of New England, or wherever they may come from, ought to find fault with us for asking some help, that this national problem may be looked after by the National Government. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida promised to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will in just a moment. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE]. [Applause.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, I believe that it will be in the public interest for the House to agree to this conference report. When the river and harbor bill was sent to conference the House will remember that the attention of its conferees was directed to seven Senate provisions to which they were instructed not to yield unless especially authorized by the House to do so. The merit of the different propositions was not especially called into question; but it so happened that they were all matters which had received more or less attention in the Senate, but had never been discussed in the House. One of those provisions was of great concern to me personally, for it affected my district. It was the so-called Connecticut River dam bill, which would have given the cities of Springfield and Holyoke the greatly needed benefits of navigation. But, Mr. Speaker, I recognized that that provision, carrying with it the adoption of a great national policy, was entitled to receive here in the House the fullest consideration. There was no time for the House to act upon amendments, and I became convinced that if it remained in the bill in the form that it passed the Senate it would be fatal to it. Consequently, that provision has gone out. It is only fair, however, to say that the project itself met with no criticism, and its adoption by Congress at an early date is assured. The other provisions to which the attention of your conferees was called had never been considered in the House, and every one of them has gone out of the bill.

In addition, your conferees were successful in getting the Senate to recede upon some items which violated our rules requiring favorable reports from the engineers, and we were able to reduce the amount of the bill a little more than $1,000,000. We do not present the bill as a perfect production, but it is a carefully considered piece of legislation, and I believe I am justified in unhesitatingly asking Members of this House to indorse the action of their conferees.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to add just a brief personal word. Since I made the announcement a year ago that I would not be a candidate for reelection, my colleagues upon both sides of the aisle have said so many gracious and generous things, in public and private, about me that I wish to express my very deepest appreciation. The fact that I have not merited all that has been said has not interfered in the slightest degree with my enjoyment of it. [Laughter.]

I will confess that I am shameless to that degree. I have been a Member of the House for about 15 years. I think the man must be hopeless who is not broadened and rendered more patriotic by such service. If there was about me when I came here any suggestion of sectionalism, and I presume there might have been, every vestige of it has been eliminated. [Applause.] And as I have sat here in this Congress under one of the best and fairest Speakers that this House has ever had [applause], and as I have worked with my colleagues upon the other side of the aisle I confess that it has been pretty difficult to keep myself up to the point of believing that he and they were a menace to the Republic. [Applause.]

My first service in this House was upon the Committee on Elections No. 1. One of the first matters that came before us was the contested-election case of a bright, good-looking young man from Alabama, named OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD. I was one of those who after hearing the evidence voted to keep Mr. UNDERWOOD in his seat. An interesting memory in connection with this is that another member of the committee who also voted to keep Mr. UNDERWOOD in his seat is no less a personage than the distinguished and very effective minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.] In spite of radical differences as to the tariff I think there will be general agreement to the proposition that we thereby rendered a great public service. [Applause.]

I ask nothing in return for my action upon that contested-election case, but if the gentleman from Alabama feels that he must destroy the industries in my district during the coming extra session, I hope he will at least display all of the gentleness and tenderness of which his nature is capable. [Laughter and applause.] I shall not speak in detail of my service here during 15 interesting and eventful years. Perhaps some time I shall write a book about it. That is everybody's privilege. All I wish now to say is that I shall leave the House on the 4th of March with, as you all must know, the greatest affection and good will for my colleagues on both sides of the aisle and with entire respect for their patriotic purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the more experienced Members of this House will not smile at the simplicity of my remarks. I asked the chairman of this committee if, in giving over $48,000,000 to rivers and harbors, he had considered or had any knowledge of the aggregate appropriations to be made at this session. Of course he had not. I asked him, again, if he had any knowledge of the total amount of the aggregate revenues of the fiscal year 1914, from which those appropriations were to be paid. He confessed that he had not. We are in a situation, then, in the House of making appropriations for the year—how much we know not—and of drawing upon a future public fund for their payment the amount of which we have no idea. While I freely admit that there may be conditions when appropriations must be made in ignorance of forthcoming revenues, appropriations that are absolutely necessary to conduct the operations of this Government, I wish to say that it is only the poorest wisdom, the lowest self-restraint, the slightest sense of responsibility to our great constituencies which could permit us to appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars for purposes condemned by the best public thought and certainly not absolutely necessary, when we knew not what the revenues would be or whether they would be adequate to pay this draft. We have reached in this country a very serious condition. Every man, woman, and child under the probable appropriations of this session will be taxed some $12 apiece in the coming year for the maintenance of this Government—$1,200,000,000 of appropriations, $60 for every head of a family in the Republic, and this particular bill constitutes a large proportion of that sum. I say to the House that we ought to realize that we are dipping our hands into the pay envelope of every workman in this country and taking out some $5 a month from their hard-earned compensation. If gentlemen of the House are willing to do that, in the simplicity of my nature I am not willing to follow them. I hope that further action on this bill will be suspended until somebody on the floor can tell us how much we are going to tax the great American public, and can tell us, at least with prospective vision, how much money is going to be in the Treasury to pay the tax. Only one institution on earth can break into the Treasury of the United States, and that is this body, and every one of us is paid $7,500 a year not to do it. I trust we may prove loyal to the country that pays and honors us so liberally. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman only has five minutes left.

Mr. SPARKMAN. According to my understanding, I have 11 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question, then.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 28858, the general deficiency appropriation bill, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 28858) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913 and prior years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the amendments read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman be willing to let the House have a separate vote on amendments numbered 1 and 53?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What are they?

Mr. MANN. Amendment numbered 1 is the one which increases the salary of the Secretary to the President from $6,000 to $7,500 after the 4th of March, and amendment numbered 53 is the one which proposes to appropriate for an extra month's salary for the employees of the House and Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the gentleman be willing to take a roll call on that proposition?

Mr. MANN. I would be willing to have a roll call on the two propositions combined.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will let the bill go to conference, and probably there will be an opportunity to vote on some of these amendments, just which I do not wish to predict; but it is important, as the gentleman can realize, that at this stage of the session the bill go to conference.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think that is true, but, on the other hand, it seems to me there never will be a better occasion than now for the Democratic Party and Democratic Members to swallow all the professions they made a year ago in reference to the salary of the Secretary to the President. A year ago we were told that the Democrats in the House would never consent to continue the salary of the Secretary to the President at $7,500 beyond the 4th of March. That was agreed to as a compromise.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to me for a minute?

The SPEAKER. The other gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has not finished.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He was asking me a question.

Mr. MANN. I want to see whether the Democrats of the House were honest in their professions—I do not mind personally—a year ago, before the election, or whether their professions then were purely hypocrisy.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAIR. I would state to the gentleman from Illinois that one year ago there was one Democrat on this side who believed that the Secretary of the President should have a salary of $7,500 a year, and voted accordingly.

Mr. MANN. Well, there were very few. This side of the House at that time was quite willing to continue the salary of the Secretary to the President, whether the President be Republican or Democrat, at $7,500 a year. That side of the House insisted on making an amendment placing the salary at $6,000 a year, and as a compromise in the end the salary was fixed at $6,500 a year until March 4, 1913, and then fixed at $6,000 thereafter. Now, did you mean it? Will you stick to it? Was it hypocrisy or are you honest?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to examine the amendments proposed to the deficiency bill by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I have. The gentleman has not been as busy as I have been.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; I have been quite as busy. I have been in conference with the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have been in conference with Senate conferees since 10 o'clock this morning, and this bill passed late last night. I have not a copy of the amendments, but I have the original bill in my hand. There are 68 Senate amendments, and if the gentleman asks at this time to have a separate vote on two, and some other gentleman insists on finding out whether somebody else was honest by having a separate vote on some other amendments, this bill will never go to conference, because it will take all the time from now until adjournment to vote on these separate amendments.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think the course I have suggested is unusual. It is the common experience on these amendments that the gentleman desires to send to conference to have this vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At this particular time I should ask this side of the House to disagree to all of the Senate amendments, whether the vote be taken upon them singly on en bloc. What might transpire within the next 24 or 48 hours I shall not predict.

Mr. MANN. All I ask is that the gentleman will permit a separate vote on these two propositions. It will not take very long.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How many others wish separate votes?

Mr. MANN. Do not encourage them. Do not ask them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not going to encourage them.

Mr. MANN. Nobody has asked for a separate vote. Does the gentleman desire to have somebody else do so?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ascertain whether there are others. If there is to be an avalanche of them, I shall not consent to them unless I am compelled to do so.

Mr. ADAIR. What other propositions besides the Secretary's salary and the extra salary of employees?

Mr. MANN. I asked if the gentleman would consent to a separate vote on the Senate amendment which reads as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House borne on the annual and session rolls on the 1st day of February, 1913, including the Capitol police, the official reporters of the Senate and House, and W. A. Smith, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk, for extra services during the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, a sum equal to one month's pay at the compensation then paid them by law, the same to be immediately available.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will say for the conferees that that amendment will not be agreed to, and unless the Senate recedes it will come back to the House in disagreement.

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing to ask also for a separate vote on the first amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As to the other amendment, not knowing the reasons or the motives which actuated the Republican Senate in increasing the compensation of an efficient Democratic official about to take office, before I commit myself on it I should be delighted to have an opportunity to listen to them.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think a Republican Senate ought to be fixing the salaries of Democratic officials.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman mean to insinuate that the pressure brought upon the Senate to increase that salary was Tumulty-ous? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I beg my friend not to make another remark like that. [Laughter.] Does the gentleman from New York consent to a separate vote?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me five minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not any time. I am making a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will ask consent for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the reduction of the salary of the Secretary to the President from $7,500 to $6,000, to take effect on the 4th of March, soon to be here, and the refusal of the extra month's pay to the employees of the House and Senate of this Congress, to close on the 4th of March, all done last year in the name of economy, did not change a vote in the United States for or against the contesting parties.

Now, I would be very glad of an opportunity, inasmuch as that is all behind us, to vote on the merits of these two propositions. The Secretary to the President is a busy man. The salary will be $6,000 after the 4th of March if this amendment is not agreed to, or $7,500 if we agree to the Senate amendment. In addition to that, the Secretary to the President has the use of an automobile, furnished with chauffeur and all, as he ought to have, because of his great duties. Whoever is President, that ought to be the case. It is a labor saver, and, in the presence of an expenditure of over a thousand million dollars, it is false economy to deny it.

For many, many years at each session of Congress the employees of the House and Senate have received a month's extra pay. They have not received it during this Congress. They ought to have received it. They have earned it. [Applause.] And notwithstanding this is a Democratic House and practically a Democratic Senate—or worse than a Democratic Senate [laughter]—their employees ought to have it. It is simply even-handed justice to the public servants, and long before another presidential election shall come around the whole transaction will have been forgotten.

I would be glad as one Member of the House to vote. I am perfectly willing to vote now. Perhaps it would save time if we could have a vote now upon the second proposition and also upon the first, because the second proposition, covering a month's extra pay for the employees of the House and Senate, embracing a larger number of men who have performed service on small salaries, in the main, without an extra month's pay, appeals to me quite as much as the other, although one costs a good deal more than the other. My observation is that the people of the United States, great, rich, powerful, do not care so much about the amount of the expenditures as they care about the fact as to whether or not the expenditures are properly made for service performed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will modify the request and except Senate amendment numbered 1.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I object to the request.

The SPEAKER. What is it that the gentleman objects to?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I object to excepting the one.

The SPEAKER. Is it the exception, or the gentleman's request?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is the exception.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that he make his request.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules——

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table and disagree to all the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers a privileged motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in the opinion of the House the managers on the part of the House should agree in conference to the substance of the Senate amendment numbered 1.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Illinois wish any time?

Mr. MANN. Not except to state what the amendment is; that is all.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Stuart, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 18787, relating to the limitation of hours of daily service.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I shall only read the amendment, Mr. Speaker. Amendment numbered 1 is as follows:

To make the salary of the Secretary to the President at the rate of $7,500 per annum from March 4, 1913, to June 30, 1914, inclusive, $3,312.50, and hereafter said salary is fixed at the rate of $7,500 per annum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made the statement that he desired to ascertain whether this side of the House was honest when it fixed the compensation of the Secretary to the President. The gentleman may have overlooked the fact that something has happened since the last session of Congress that may have affected some gentlemen; but I think I can give a history of this matter which will somewhat clear up the situation.

About two sessions ago the Secretary to the President requested that certain changes be made in the compensation of the personnel of the White House force. He requested certain increases of compensation to be allowed in the legislative bill, in order to obtain what were termed high-grade men. It was stated that it was not intended to use the money to increase the compensation of gentlemen then employed. Upon that understanding the Committee on Appropriations reported the legislative bill with the recommendations requested. When the bill went to the Senate, the Senate modified it by increasing the compensation of the Secretary of the President to $10,000 a year. There was a severe controversy over the matter. There was activity on the part of certain high officials to have the House agree to that amendment. Finally, as a compromise, enough votes were obtained to fix the compensation at $7,500. Subsequently, instead of appointing new officials in the White House to take the positions for which the increased compensation had been fixed, promotions were made in the then existing force; so that the money, appropriated for the purpose of obtaining a different class of men, was used to increase the compensation of the existing force. There was a natural resentment at such treatment of the House, and at the last session of the Congress the House endeavored to undo what it believed had been done in violation of an agreement between those representing the executive force and the House, and it insisted on cutting down the compensation of the Secretary to the President.

Since that action was taken, the President elect has announced the name of the gentleman who is to occupy that position under the next administration. A Republican Senate, familiar with his career, knowing his effective work as Secretary to the President elect during the two years he has been governor of New Jersey, realizing the conditions under which the compensation was fixed at $6,500 from the 4th of March, believing that the compensation to be paid to this official whom they know, whose name has been announced, should be $7,500, and the Republican side of the House, through its recognized leader, apparently acquiescing in that situation, and asking the House to concur in this amendment of the Senate, so far as I am concerned, knowing this gentleman personally, and how efficient he is, I am prepared to unite with the gentleman from Illinois and with the Republican Senate in fixing this compensation at such a figure as in the judgment of our political opponents he is entitled to receive.

Mr. MANN and Mr. CANNON rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to both gentlemen.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this side of the House has believed in having a capable man as Secretary to the President and has been quite willing to pay a reasonable salary. That side of the House has all the time insisted for several years that the salary ought not to be more than $6,000, and under the Holman rule it adopted an amendment fixing the salary at $6,000 in the legislative bill passed a year ago. In conference it was finally agreed to make the salary $7,500 until the 4th of March.

There has been no change in the situation, except the fact that the gentlemen on that side of the House now realize that in asking for patronage, in seeking for jobs, in hunting for places under the incoming administration, they will be forced to meet face to face with the Secretary of the President, and most of them have already turned tail and run to cover on the question of the increase of his salary. I wish to ask for a division on this vote, and I hope that this side of the House on the division will remain in their seats and let the Democratic side of the House express itself, at least on the division. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I may say to the gentleman from Illinois that this side of the House, according to his opinion, will enjoy during the next four years a privilege that many of that side have not enjoyed during the last four years. They at least will be able to meet the Secretary to the President, if not the President himself.

Mr. MANN. That is an unkind and unjust fling. They never will have a better secretary than the present Secreary to the President. [Applause on the Republican side.] And if we can judge by what the papers say, they are not likely to have so good a one.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was not referring to the personality of any individual; I had in mind the atmosphere that was not so pleasing to gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield me two minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to the gentleman to offer an amendment until I hear what it is.

Mr. CANNON. But the gentleman yielded me two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yielded for debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can have his amendment read in his time.

The SPEAKER. When the Member in control of time yields for debate, he does not yield for an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois stated that he wanted two minutes, and I yielded.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, Mr. Speaker; they may return my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have it read in his time.

Mr. CANNON. No; if I can not move for business, I do not care to move for buncombe. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the gentleman yield me some time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much does the gentleman want?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I am always in favor of an employee of the Government securing compensation in accordance with the services he renders. I am pleased to see the leader of the minority and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations so cheerfully assisting in the prospect of securing an increase of salary to the Secretary of the President from $6,000 to $7,500. I do not desire to take issue with them. The services rendered in that position may be worth $7,500.

But a few days ago a few of us who believed in those who render their services by the exercise of their physical powers, the mechanics working for the Government, endeavored to secure an appropriation in this House to pay the employees of the naval department in the navy yard in accordance with the award that had been given them for a 10 per cent increase. I regret that both of these gentlemen who now so cheerfully labor to secure this increase for the Secretary to the President obstructed the efforts of those who endeavored to have the Government comply with the obligation made to those workmen.

I would like to see gentlemen in the House be fair and treat all alike. Certainly they can not claim to be fair when they undertake to obstruct the employees from getting their just dues, employees who are earning their bread by the sweat of their brow. I feel constrained until there is some kind of an equal consideration for the employees of the Government and others who do manual labor to oppose this increase whether I am successful or not. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL].

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who supported the proposition to increase the pay of the employees of the navy yard. Therefore I am peculiarly fitted to answer the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN], who has just taken his seat. I think it is most unwise to make reprisals upon one set of workmen because an injustice was done to another set of workmen. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was unjust, or, rather, was mistaken in his action in not allowing an increase to be made to the employees of the navy yard, that is no reason why he should not be supported in this correct and admirable motion to recognize the dignity of the President's office and to pay his secretary a salary befitting his position and befitting his deserts.

Furthermore, I have always voted—and the RECORD will prove it, notwithstanding my colleagues may have opposed it—for every proposition that was made increasing the salary of the Secretary to the President, regardless of politics, and I will be sustained in holding that position to-day. I can personally and most decidedly assure the House that this particular secretary is certainly worthy of this increase. It would be an injustice to him to withhold it, and I hope the House will have the wisdom to vote the increase provided and authorized in the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. If Republicans realize the fairness of making the increase, Democrats—in fact the entire House—ought to support the proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In reply to both gentlemen who are interested in increasing the compensation of certain employees of the Government——

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to state that the increase had been awarded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I be not interrupted until I finish what I have to say. Gentlemen are complaining because I antagonized on the floor amendments that were offered purporting to increase the compensation of certain employees of the navy yard at Washington. None of them would have effected the purpose designed by those who proposed the amendments.

In my capacity as a Member in charge of a bill on the floor I was compelled to antagonize amendments to change the bill. Everyone knows that frequently Members are compelled to oppose amendments to bills although they may favor the purpose to be accomplished.

The navy yard employees in Washington have not received their increase in compensation, because the Secretary of the Navy has declined in the discharge of his duties to carry out his obligations as the head of the Navy Department. If he had believed that the increase should have been made, all that it was necessary for him to do was to sign the order granting the increase, and then request the money to supply the deficiency that would have been occasioned as a result of that order. That word was sent to him——

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I decline to yield. That word was sent to him from my office, and he desired me to make an agreement that if he in the discharge of his duties did something he was authorized to do, I would acquiesce in what he did and indorse what he did. I sent word back that I declined in advance to indorse the action of any official for any purpose; that when the matter came before the committee under proper conditions, in my capacity as chairman I would take such action as in my position I felt justified in doing. If these gentlemen have been unsuccessful in obtaining an increase to which they are entitled it can not be attributed to me.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield for a question.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if there is not a law forbidding heads of departments creating a deficiency by their own willful act?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a law which——

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. One moment. I want to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. The gentleman has answered my question when he said there is a law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And as I control the floor, I will answer the question myself and not permit the gentleman from Massachusetts to do it. There is no law which prohibits some deficiencies being created, and such deficiency as would have been created in this instance is one that is authorized under the law. If the Secretary, or whoever had charge of this matter, was familiar with the law, as he should be as the head of a great department of the Government, that would have been known to him.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to be diverted any further from the subject under consideration. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in his usual graceful way, has put up to our side of the House a question which we ought to answer. He has asked us on our side of the House if we were sincere when we heretofore stood for a reduction of this salary from $10,000 to $7,500 and then to $6,000 per year, and up until this time I have not heard anyone on this side of the House rise in his seat and say that he was sincere when he was giving his vote to reduce this salary when the Republican Party was in control. I want to say that so far as I am concerned I was sincere when I voted against the increase before and I am going to vote against the gentleman's amendment. I have stood on the floor of this House, and I believe that the records will show in a consistent way and manner I have uniformly, by the use of points of order, raised my voice in protest against an increase of salary to individuals where I thought they were already drawing salary high enough, but in doing that I have tried to use judgment, I have tried to use discretion. I have never used the point of order to reduce an increase of salary, where, in my judgment, that salary was not high enough. The gentleman from Illinois has admonished his followers on that side to sit silent and not vote, and I presume they will mind him. I presume they will obey him like good and faithful children, as they should. It is still up to us, gentlemen, to say whether or not we have been playing buncombe in this thing. There is no getting away from the proposition at all, and I hope that the gentleman's motion will be voted down.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM. When this proposition was before the House the last time I voted for the proposed increase. I believed then that the man who was Secretary to the President occupied as responsible a place as the place I occupied on this floor, and that he was entitled to as much salary as I was receiving. I believe so still, and now that circumstances have changed, I do not propose to change the vote that I cast at that time. I think the Secretary to the President occupies a very responsible position. I think he ought to be a man at least as able as the average Congressman, and I think the duties he has to perform are as arduous and important as those of the average Congressman. I believe, therefore, that he ought to be as well paid. If $7,500 per year is too much for him, it is too much for us. I shall, therefore, if I get an opportunity, vote now as I voted then, to increase the salary of the Secretary to the President to $7,500 a year.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman remembers I stood by his side and we voted together for the increase to $10,000.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am glad the gentleman is still with me.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, on a former occasion I assumed the great risk and danger of somewhat antagonizing my Democratic leader. I step over here now amongst you Republicans and run the hazard of admonishing you not to follow the direction of your leader. He has just said that when this question is put to a vote you ought to sit still and not vote. I want to appeal to you Republicans not to follow his advice, for if you do not vote here upon this floor in the next 48 hours God only knows when you will ever get a chance to vote in this House again. [Laughter and applause.] My colleague, the distinguished ex-leader and ex-Speaker [Mr. CANNON], is here vehemently speaking for increasing a salary from $6,000 to $7,500. In all the days when, with your tyrannous czarism, you presided over the House and these Republicans followed you you Republicans were unable to appropriate more than $150,000,000 for pensions, and we Democrats, before we have organized our Democratic Senate and before we have got our President inaugurated, have appropriated $180,000,000. We know how to legislate. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

We have reformed the rules of the House so that the people of this country can get action from their Representatives. Why, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], who presided over the Committee on Naval Affairs on the Republican side for many years, was never able to get over $123,000,000 for the Navy, and before our President comes into office we have got $140,000,000 under our reformed rules, and we are legislating for the people on economical lines. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] We are going to demonstrate to the great ex-chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE] that we can reduce the tariff and at the same time increase the appropriations. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] The people of this country drove you Republicans from power because you were incompetent and incapable of properly appropriating their money and caring for the great interests and industries of our country. I come over here on your side to console you. There sits my prohibition friend, BARTHOLDT, from Missouri [laughter], who was for years Republican chairman of the Public Buildings Committee, and he never was sufficiently capable to get a public buildings bill through the House over $25,000,000, and we are about to raise you to the modest sum of $40,000,000. Oh, do not go about chiding us for discarding our economy platform that said: We denounce the Republican Party's reckless and profligate expenditure of the people's money. That platform was made, like the Republican platform, to get into office on—and we have won. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed——

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I rise to ask the gentleman from New York to yield me five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I have heard it said that a school-teacher once asked her pupils, among other things of a historical nature, if they knew for what their Congressman was noted, and a hand came up from a ruddy-faced boy, "What is it, James?" the teacher inquired, and he said, "My papa says that our Congressman is noted for seed that won't come up and for argument that won't go down." Some of the arguments on this side of the House, it seems to me, if we follow them a short time, do not go down. From the time I came into this Congress, almost five years ago, I have heard the argument on this side of the House, and we have gone out into our campaigns advocating the theory that a good many men holding clerical positions in the Government are paid too much money. I never used that argument generally in my campaigns, but I have heard it on this side of the House again and again; and within the past year, as I recall, we voted for a reduction to $6,000 salary for the President's Secretary after having heard the argument that he is afforded the largest possibility of any man in the United States for future employment. The argument has repeatedly been made here that the best and most skillful clerical men in the United States are anxious and willing and ready to take this position, and therefore we reduced the salary to $6,000. But here we are within a year from that time, and a great many on our side agreeing with the Republicans that that salary ought to be raised to $7,500.

I have never been a hairsplitter in the matter of adequate salaries for first-class men for the most important Government offices, but I merely stood up to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Republicans could here consistently paraphrase Kipling's "Recessional" into—

> Lord God of hosts, be with them yet,
> Lest they forget, lest they forget.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Laughter.]

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to instruct the conferees.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] rise?

Mr. KAHN. I move that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. I demand a division.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the motion be reported again.

The SPEAKER. This is on the previous question.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the demand.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the instructions——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the instructions may be reported. I would like to hear them.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in the opinion of the House the managers on the part of the House should agree in conference to the substance of Senate amendment No. 1.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment be reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment to which the motion applies.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 1, page 2, after line 8, insert:
"To make the salary of the Secretary to the President at the rate of $7,500 per annum from March 4, 1913, to June 30, 1914, inclusive, $3,312.50, and hereafter said salary is fixed at the rate of $7,500 per annum."

The SPEAKER. This motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] practically instructs the conferees to agree to that amendment.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Those in favor of the motion will vote "aye" and those opposed will vote "no."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 49.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of the motion of instructions offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will, as their names are called, vote "yea" and those opposed will vote "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 196, nays 72, answered "present" 18, not voting 95, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House, at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the amendments of the Senate, namely:

Amendments Nos. 1, 3, 4, 6, and 7: Strike out the words "snagging," leaving the bill so that it applies to "dredging, or rock excavation" instead of to "dredging, snagging, or rock excavation," as it appeared in the bill as it passed the House.

Amendment No. 2: Strike out the words "terminate within nine hours from the beginning of workday," after the word "shall," in line 11, page 2, and insert the words "be continuous except for customary intervals for meals or rest." The effect of the amendment proposed by the conference is to continue the language of existing law.

Amendment No. 5: Would have repealed the eight-hour law of August 1, 1892. The amendment proposed by the conference corrects that defect.

Amendment No. 8: Excludes from the operations of the act work done under contracts which may be entered into under provisions of appropriation acts approved prior to the passage of this act.

Amendment No. 9: Provides that this act shall become effective and be in force on and after March 1, 1913.

W. B. WILSON,
FRANK BUCHANAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table Senate concurrent resolution 41, relative to the eulogies on the late Vice President SHERMAN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Y.

The resolution was agreed to.

PUBLICITY IN TAKING TESTIMONY.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the unfinished business under suspension of the rules, which is Senate bill 8000, providing for publicity in taking evidence under the act of July 2, 1890.

The SPEAKER. A second has been ordered on this.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; a second has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I will ask gentlemen whether they expect to use all the time.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say that I shall not use more than two minutes, unless time is consumed on the other side. I do not know how much time they will consume. It may be necessary to consume all the time on this side. There is no disposition to do that, however, unless it is necessary.

Mr. MANN. I think it has been the intention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], if the business on the Speaker's table would permit, to move a recess about half past 6, or thereabouts, for an hour and a half or two hours.

Mr. NORRIS. If we consume all the time, this will only take until 6.40 o'clock.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is a quorum present.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I insist that there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count to satisfy the gentleman.

Pending the count,

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he insists on his point of no quorum present?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do. I will withdraw it if the gentleman wishes to make a motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to have the House run for about half an hour longer before we take a recess.

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt of the presence of a quorum in this Hall. The Chair will count to be sure that it is so. [After counting.] Two hundred and seventeen Members present—a quorum. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Before beginning the debate, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk report the bill for the benefit of those who were not here this morning at 1 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 8000) providing for publicity in taking evidence under act of July 2, 1890.

Be it enacted, etc., That in the taking of depositions of witnesses for use in any suit in equity brought by the United States under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, and in the hearings before any examiner or special master appointed to take testimony therein, the proceedings shall be open to the public as freely as are trials in open court; and no order excluding the public from attendance on any such proceedings shall be valid or enforceable.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I explained the other day when we had this bill up under the Unanimous Consent Calendar just exactly what it was and what the effect would be, but for those who were not here then I want to say briefly that the bill provides that in the taking of evidence in equity suits commenced by the Government under the Sherman antitrust act the taking of the evidence shall be public.

I presume Members all realize that this bill applies only to civil cases, and only cases in which the United States is plaintiff. I think, without any exception in the history of the past, in these cases a master has been appointed to take the evidence, and it is necessary for him to go to different places in the country and take evidence and possibly consume several months of time in procuring the testimony.

There never was a question raised but what this must be done in public and that the public was entitled to admission, until about a year ago in a case of the United States against the shoe machinery company in Boston, a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey, the question was raised and a demand was made by the defendant to that suit that this evidence be taken in private, and that no one but the attorneys on both sides be admitted to the hearings. The question had never been raised before and never had been attempted, and after considerable argument and filing of briefs before the court, the court finally decided that the evidence should be taken in private.

There is no doubt from the reading of the briefs, and from the opinion of the court, that the court had the right under the law to decide in its discretion as it did. It was not error. In other words, it is a discretionary matter.

The Attorney General, in the prosecution of the trusts under this act, says that he has very often been materially assisted in the publicity given to the evidence taken in one place before he finshed the taking of evidence in another place. It always leads to the development of other facts and of other material in the case, and has always been of material assistance in the past.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Attorney General request this legislation?

Mr. NORRIS. He did, and has devoted considerable space in his last report to the subject.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman state whether it is usual to take testimony in public before a master in cases where the Government of the United States is not interested?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so; there never has been any instance in these cases where the evidence has not been taken in public.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the Government of the United States in a different position, in taking evidence of this kind, from a private individual, in taking evidence before masters?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. There is reason for this, as these cases are always brought in the name of the people of the United States. They always take evidence in different sections of the country, and some cases often consume seven or eight months' time. If there were no publicity given to it until the master's report is filed it would mean that there never would be any publicity, because at the end of the taking of the evidence it consists of many thousands of pages which no one would read through.

Mr. MADDEN. How does the publicity of the evidence taken before the master prior to the close of the trial prejudice or assist the rights of the person who is prosecuting them?

Mr. NORRIS. I have just said that the Attorney General said that he has never had a case but what he has been materially assisted by the publicity of the evidence in the case before he had got through with the case. In addition to that all the evidence in these cases is taken before a master, and if it did not have publicity before the master it would have no publicity at all. It means secreted evidence, and this ought to appeal to gentlemen who are defending the courts, and doing it honestly, it seems to me; that the real friends of the courts will be the ones to legislate to give the widest publicity to everything that happens in the court.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. In the particular case to which the gentleman alludes, the court, of course, had discretionary power to have the evidence taken in secret.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. The request was made by the defense for the secret hearing?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Can the gentleman say what was the attitude of the Attorney General?

Mr. NORRIS. The Attorney General opposed it as well as he knew how, and filed an elaborate brief.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state what was the outcome in that particular case?

Mr. NORRIS. There has been no outcome. The fact is that under the law, according to the order for taking the evidence in secret, the Attorney General has never made another move. While I am not authorized to say it—he did not say it to me—he stopped the case. It is my belief that if it is to be taken in secret, he never will proceed further with the case.

Mr. AUSTIN. What reason did the court give for his order?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think he gave any reason. I have read all of the briefs, and there were no authorities cited on either side.

I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill was given careful consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee reached the unanimous conclusion that this bill ought to pass, to prevent an abuse in the administration of public justice. The day for star-chamber proceedings has passed. This order made by the judge in the investigation of the case against the Shoe Machinery Trust was in its nature a return to star-chamber methods, and the judge, for reasons known to himself or to that trust, made the order that the testimony should be taken in secret, so that the public should not hear it and so that the press should not make it known. The committee agrees with the Attorney General, who is the officer charged with the prosecution of these trusts, that publicity ought to be given to all court proceedings just as publicity is given to congressional proceedings in the investigation of cases against the trust. I can not imagine any good reason why the proceedings should have been in secret. This is an age of publicity. We pass different kinds of publicity legislation here, and it is the first time in the history of American jurisprudence, so far as I know, that the courts have made a solemn order denying to the public knowledge of a public transaction, of a matter in which the general public are interested. Then, again, the Attorney General says that this publicity of these investigations before the master has been of incalculable benefit to him in the prosecution of cases against the trusts; that the bystanders hear the testimony given in behalf of those who are friendly to the trusts and have frequently come to him or to his assistants and given information that has led to uncovering wrongful contracts of these unlawful combinations. He says the dissemination of the information through the newspaper press has been most helpful to him in the enforcement of the antitrust law.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this House will do as the Committee on Judiciary did, reach a unanimous conclusion that the bill ought to pass.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I am just as anxious as the gentlemen who have spoken for the pending bill for the widest publicity at every trial, but the bill before us does not provide for publicity in any judicial trial. The hearing is before an examiner or a special master. It is little more than taking a deposition. It is not a trial, but a proceeding preliminary to a trial. In taking the evidence before a special master the witness is asked certain questions, and although the attorney upon the other side may make an objection against any particular question upon the ground that it is immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant, still the witness is bound to answer. Subsequently the court passes upon the matter, but if the hearing before the examiner be public the damage is done before the matter reaches the court. The consequence will be that a shrewd attorney can worm out trade secrets, can worm out secret processes of manufacture from a willing or indifferent witness, much to the detriment of the concern with which he is connected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Would it not be, if the witness is willing, just as easy to get that evidence from him without putting him on the stand?

Mr. KAHN. It would not; because the attorney on the other side in the case, if it were tried before a court, could interpose an objection, and in all likelihood the court would rule on the objection and bar out the testimony.

Mr. NORRIS. But he could go out on the street and tell it. He could publish it in the newspapers, if he were a willing witness.

Mr. KAHN. But there are many men who will go to court and tell all they know, as the gentleman knows, who will not go out on the street corners and tell what they know; when questions are asked them in court they frequently gladly volunteer evidence.

Mr. LENROOT. In a secret hearing when a deposition is taken it is finally made public and read in court, is it not?

Mr. KAHN. It is; but still while it is opened in court, nevertheless the materiality and competency of the questions that have been objected to are ruled upon by the court, and if they are improper they are excluded and can not be taken as evidence in the hearing.

Mr. LENROOT. They nevertheless become public, although in a legal sense they are excluded.

Mr. KAHN. While, in a measure, they become public, nevertheless the court rules out the objectionable questions and the answers thereto. As a general proposition, in the taking of depositions no one is present except the attorneys who are retained in the litigation and the witnesses, and they do not spread broadcast the evidence of the witnesses to the detriment of the litigants in the case. Besides, it is doubtful whether any deposition will ever assume the importance of a hearing before an examiner or a special master in actions of the character referred to in this bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. For a question; certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Has not the public the right to know whether these officials, such as the Attorney General, are conducting these examinations properly, and how will they know unless they be made public?

Mr. KAHN. These questions can all be asked in public and there will be no objection to doing that if this bill can be properly amended. There was another bill introduced in the Senate at the same time this bill was introduced, a companion bill, S. 7999, and a provision in that bill is this:

> In any suit in equity pending or hereafter brought in any such court under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890," wherein the United States is complainant, if the Attorney General shall include in the certificate made by him, as hereinbefore provided, a statement that, in his opinion, the nature of the case demands that the testimony be taken by a special master in accordance with the provisions of this act, the court shall thereupon enter an order appointing a special master to hear the parties and take the evidence in the cause, and such special master shall have and may exercise with respect of such case all the powers which the court would have in the conduct and trial of the cause, including power to rule on the admission of evidence; and the special master shall, upon the completion of the evidence, report to the court the facts found by him upon said evidence.

And so forth.

Now, this bill under consideration here, with that provision that I have just read in it, would be an admirable bill. I would not oppose it for a moment. The examiner or special master in hearing the case would have the right to pass upon the relevancy or materiality of the questions propounded; but under present practice the master can not do that. He does not pass upon the competency of those questions at all, and for that reason, in my judgment, the bill is liable to cause serious damage to legitimate business.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman can use his own time.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether or not the master will rule on evidence either admitted or excluded does not depend upon his appointment. The court right now could give a master authority to pass upon the admissibility of evidence under the law as it stands to-day.

Mr. KAHN. The fact of the matter is the master does not pass upon the materiality of the questions, and the fact that the master should pass upon those questions was evident to the gentleman who introduced Senate bill 8000, because he also introduced this other bill (S. 7999) which plainly puts it up to the master to pass upon the relevancy and materiality of the questions propounded. With that amendment in this bill there can be no objection whatever to it. I think it is only fair to all litigants, especially those who have some secret process of manufacturing a particular ware or commodity, to have their rights protected. They should not be compelled to disclose their secret in a hearing of this kind and for that reason I think the bill should at least be amended, if it be passed at all, by adding this section, which is a part of Senate bill 7999. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Ohio to withhold his motion for a moment, when I will move a recess. If it is evident we can not get a vote before supper, we will get it after supper.

Mr. NORRIS. I will suggest to the gentleman I would just as lief have the vote after supper as now, but I think we can finish this debate in a very short time.

The SPEAKER. But the point of no quorum has been made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The point of no quorum has been made.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand; and I do not want to delay proceedings, but I do not desire to have this bill lose its position.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio to withhold the point of no quorum for a moment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say I have been called away to a conference, and I will ask unanimous consent that I may yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recollect that after he gets through with this other matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there is a resolution of the House—resolution No. 71—on the table to print the tariff hearings, for the benefit of Members of Congress, with a slight Senate amendment, and I desire to call that up and ask that it be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio withhold his point of no quorum for a moment?

Mr. POST. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 71.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound 2,500 copies of the tariff hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives since the 6th day of January last, 1,700 for the use of the House and 800 copies for the use of the Senate.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 25, 1913.

Resolved, That the foregoing concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives do pass with the following amendment: Line 2, after the word "bound," insert "in buckram."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the House the Senate amendment merely provides that the book shall be bound in the cheapest possible manner, and in order to get them it is necessary for the resolution to go through at this time. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to consider this resolution now. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 8.45 p. m.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 8.45 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

At the expiration of the recess the House resumed its session.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Stuart, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 8589. An act relating to supervision of the Lincoln memorial.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 28858) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. GAMBLE, and Mr. CULBERSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PUBLICITY IN TAKING EVIDENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has 8 minutes left, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] 10 minutes. If nobody wants to make a speech the Chair will put the question.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present. This is a very important matter, and the House ought to know about it before it goes to a vote. I suggest that a quorum be present to vote upon the matter.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, a quorum will be here in a few moments. Otherwise we should take up 40 minutes in calling the yeas and nays. The Members will be here in 10 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I want the Members of the House to hear the merits of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. The Members are all familiar with the bill.

Mr. RODDENBERY. They know more about this than they do about conference reports.

Mr. KAHN. I do not know about that. Some statements have been made about the attitude of the Attorney General. I have the report of the Attorney General for the year 1912 in my hand, in which he says specifically that the amendment I propose ought to be adopted. Members do not know that, although they may have heard that the Attorney General favored this measure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from California withhold his point just a moment?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. May I inquire whether, pending the arrival of Members, there is any routine business on the Speaker's table that ought to be attended to?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker's table is cleared up.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table——

The SPEAKER. Oh, no. There is one bill already pending on a motion to suspend the rules. There are certain gentlemen here who have such things as bridge bills, which nobody will object to, and by unanimous consent of the House the Chair would recognize them if a larger House were here.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that for 20 minutes the Members be accorded recognition on such bills as that.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from California will withhold his motion for 20 minutes, that could be done.

Mr. KAHN. I withhold it.

The SPEAKER. Then, without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

MATTHEW T. FULLER.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to call up the bill H. R. 16993, with a Senate amendment, and move that the House concur in the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

An act (H. R. 16993) for the relief of Matthew T. Fuller.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] moves to concur in the Senate amendment. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

E. T. BOURGER.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up House bill 28613 and put it on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 28613) to construe the name of E. T. Bourger, as the same appears in the report of Hawkins-Taylor Commission in relation to Company F, Osage County Battalion, Missouri Home Guards, to refer to Joseph Bourgeret, of Osage County, Mo.

Be it enacted, etc., That the name of E. T. Bourger, as the same appears in the report of the Hawkins-Taylor Commission in relation to Company F, Osage County Battalion, Missouri Home Guards, shall be construed as referring to Joseph Bourgeret, who now resides in Osage County, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHACKLEFORD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

YOSEMITE PARK.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider Senate bill 8279, in relation to Yosemite Park. That is a bill extending from 10 to 20 years the time within which a hotel may be built.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 8279) to amend an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was taking it for granted that every gentleman in the House knew what was in every bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman is entirely correct, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to grant leases, for periods of not exceeding 20 years, at annual rentals, and under terms and conditions to be determined by him, to any person, corporation, or company he may authorize to transact business in the Yosemite National Park, for separate tracts of land, not exceeding 20 acres each, at such places, not to exceed 10 in number to any person, corporation, or company in said park, as the comfort and convenience of visitors may require, for the construction and maintenance of substantial hotel buildings and buildings for the protection of motor cars, stages, stock and equipment, etc. Such leases may, at the option of the Secretary of the Interior, contain appropriate provisions for the appraisement, at the expiration of the lease, of the value of such hotel and other buildings (or portions thereof) as may be constructed by the lessees, respectively, and the payment of the same to the lessees in case a new lease be made to persons other than the said lessees, such payments to be made by said new lessees, respectively.

SEC. 2. That any person or corporation or company holding a lease or leases within said park for the purposes above described is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to execute mortgages upon his or its rights and properties, including his or its contract or contracts with the Secretary of the Interior; such mortgages shall be executed in duplicate and delivered to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval, and upon his approval thereof he shall retain one of said duplicates and file the same for record in his office.

SEC. 3. That any mortgage, lien, or encumbrance created under the provisions hereof shall be subject to the rights of the Government to compel the enforcement of the terms of the lease or contract of the mortgagor, and any purchase under a foreclosure of such encumbrance shall take subject to all the conditions assumed by the original lessee or contractor.

SEC. 4. That all provisions of existing law in relation to said park not in conflict herewith are hereby continued in full force and effect.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from California a question. Just from hearing the bill read from the Clerk's desk, it purports to be a bill that gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to supervise leases for the purpose of granting hotel privileges in this park in California.

Mr. RAKER. Not the Secretary of the Treasury, but the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JAMES. How much land is it proposed to give?

Mr. RAKER. Ten-acre tracts.

Mr. JAMES. For how many hotels?

Mr. RAKER. I suppose it will be one or two, as the Secretary determines, or more. It is entirely up to the Secretary of the Interior. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that in addition the law now provides that he may issue leases for camping privileges. This provision of the law is the same as the one relating to the Yellowstone Park. This is the statement of the Secretary of the Interior with reference to it:

If the bill be amended in accordance with these suggestions, it has my hearty approval, and I earnestly recommend that it be enacted into law at the earliest practicable date.

Mr. JAMES. The inquiry I want to make of the gentleman is whether or not this bill could be used for the purpose of giving leases to men, under the guise of erecting hotel buildings, for the purpose of getting valuable lands in this park?

Mr. RAKER. Absolutely no. There is nothing of that kind in it. I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary of the Interior is negotiating a contract, which will in all probability be executed if this law passes, to put up a hotel there that will cost at least $500,000. The entire State of California is pleading for this legislation.

Mr. ANDERSON. What is the need for ten 20-acre tracts of land upon which to put one $500,000 hotel?

Mr. RAKER. That is for the purpose, if he wants to do so, of putting other hotels there. He may build more than one hotel if he wants to. It is entirely up to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KAHN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman from Minnesota will give me his attention, I will say that in the Yosemite Valley there is a hotel that has been in existence for many years. It is a good hotel, but old and not what might be called up to date. The State of California built a hotel in the valley when it had jurisdiction there, and expended some $300,000 or $400,000 in its construction and equipment. It burned down some 17 years ago, and there have been no adequate hotel accommodations in the valley since that time. The number of visitors to the valley has increased very largely in recent years. Railroad facilities now bring the traveler to within 12 miles of the floor of the valley, and therefore the long stage trips that were necessary in former years have been practically discarded. While there are a number of camps in the Yosemite, the valley needs a big new hotel; but in addition to a hotel proper it has been customary to put up cottages for visitors in places of scenic grandeur, and I daresay that the intention of the people who propose to build this hotel is also to put up quite a large number of cottages in this tract to accommodate the guests.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the gentleman will yield further, I notice in the report here there is a quotation from a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, which says:

If the bill be amended in accordance with these suggestions, it has my hearty approval, and I earnestly recommend that it be enacted into law at the earliest practicable date.

I should like to know what these amendments are.

Mr. RAKER. This is a bill which was originally introduced in the House, and the House committee reported it favorably with these amendments. The same bill, with the amendments suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, was then introduced in the Senate with those amendments in the bill, and the bill as passed by the Senate is the identical bill recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and it contains the amendments recommended by him.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it is worth while to go further with this bill. I intend to object to it anyway.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota objects.

CORA EVANS.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 27090), for the relief of Cora Evans.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Cora Evans, widow of Joseph E. Evans, the sum of $1,320, this being the amount of the annual salary of the said Joseph E. Evans, who at the time of his death was an employee of the Bureau of Mines and came to his death on April 7, 1911, in a mine at Throop, Lackawanna County, Pa., while engaged, under the direction of the Bureau of Mines, in the hazardous employment of leading a rescue party, following a mine fire, in an attempt to rescue miners supposed to be barricaded at the face of the mine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I think some explanation of this bill ought to be made.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that this is a bill to pay the widow of Mr. Evans, who lost his life in a rescue party in a mine in 1911. This provides for the payment of one year's salary which is now provided under the general law of taking care of those engaged in this hazardous occupation. At this time the law was not in effect, and of course she could not recover anything under the law as it now exists.

Mr. JAMES. Does this give her any greater right than would be given her under the law as it now exists?

Mr. FOSTER. Exactly the same.

Mr. GARNER. Why does not this claim take the same course that other claims do?

Mr. FOSTER. It does. It has been reported by the Claims Committee. This accident occurred before the law which is now in existence was passed. Last summer a similar bill was passed to pay Mrs. Ferrell one year's salary, whose husband lost his life under similar circumstances.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. MANN. We passed a bill last year extending the law of the Bureau of Mines with reference to personal injuries. The Senate added an amendment making it retroactive. I and others decidedly objected to making the law retroactive. It was stated, however, that there were only two cases where injuries had occurred in the Bureau of Mines prior to the passage of the law, and I think there was an understanding that the House by special act would take care of these two cases. One has been taken care of, and this is the other.

Mr. GARNER. The other case, then, has been taken care of, and after this there are no other cases?

Mr. MANN. There are no other cases.

Mr. SISSON. How much money does this bill carry?

Mr. FOSTER. $1,320, one year's salary, now provided by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ALICE V. HOUGHTON.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on Claims to ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 5137) for the relief of Alice V. Houghton, and pass the bill just as it came from the Senate without the House amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill without the House amendments.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 5137) for the relief of Alice V. Houghton.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Alice V. Houghton the sum of $8,000, for injuries received while employed in the Bureau of the Census, Washington, D. C., January 31, 1911, $2,000 of said sum to be paid to the said Alice V. Houghton upon the passage of this act, and the remainder of said sum to be paid in monthly installments of $75 each: Provided, That no sum of money due or to become due to the said Alice V. Houghton under this act shall be liable to attachment, levy, or seizure by or under any legal or equitable process whatever, but shall inure wholly to the benefit of the said Alice V. Houghton.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill ought to have some explanation. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the gentleman from Indiana that the Committee on Claims has picked this bill out of hundreds of bills that have been before the committee as the one most deserving of consideration. I speak for the entire Committee on Claims in asking this House to pass this bill. [Applause.] The bill has already passed the Senate calling for $8,000, which so appealed to the House that the House increased it to $10,000, but we recognize the fact that the session is so near its close that in order to give her the relief to which she is entitled, we ask the House to pass the bill just as it came from the Senate.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANTRILL. Certainly.

Mr. COX. What is her physical condition to-day?

Mr. CANTRILL. This is the case of the young lady who had her scalp torn off in the Census Bureau.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CANTRILL. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. This young woman was a clerk in the Census Bureau.

Mr. COX. I understand the circumstances of the case, but what is her physical condition?

Mr. MADDEN. This girl's condition is very bad, and she never will be better. She will eventually lose her sight. She has had five or six operations for the grafting of the scalp and, of course, they were very painful operations. Many people gave skin so that she might have her scalp restored. She has suffered untold agony and will all of her life. If there ever was a case in the history of the country where the sympathy of the Congress of the United States should be exercised, this is the case. [Applause.] Eight thousand dollars is no compensation whatever for the injuries and the suffering this girl has gone through. She never will in her life become what she ought to be, but will be a sufferer as long as she lives.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a bad precedent, but I am not going to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL]. The Chair understood the gentleman from Illinois to say that the understanding is that the Senate bill shall be passed?

Mr. MANN. That is true, and the gentleman from Kentucky desires the Senate bill passed.

Mr. CANTRILL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The first question to be taken, Mr. Speaker, will be on agreeing to the House amendments to the Senate bill.

Mr. CANTRILL. And the understanding is that the House amendments shall be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the House amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 6, by striking out the word "eight" and inserting the word "ten."

Amend, line 9, by striking out the word "two" and inserting the word "four."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the House amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANTRILL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PUBLICITY IN TAKING TESTIMONY.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from California to consume some of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska has 8 minutes remaining and the gentleman from California 10 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the bill called up for consideration by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] I regard as one of the most important called up in the closing hours of this session of Congress. During the very brief discussion upon his part he made one of the most remarkable statements relating to a legal proceeding on the part of the Government of the United States that I have heard in this Congress. When asked as to the necessity for this particular legislation, it was stated that it was because of the fact that a judge in a single case had made a special order requiring the examiner appointed by that court to take the testimony at a hearing or hearings not open to the public. Asked then what had been the outcome of that proceeding, the gentleman from Nebraska stated that there had been no outcome; that the Attorney General had abandoned the proceeding. Mr. Speaker, I think the present Attorney General of the United States is a great lawyer and has made a most efficient Attorney General, and I am not willing, as a Member of this House, or the party to which he belongs, to have it stated upon the floor of this House that he abandoned a proceeding in line with the performance of his duty simply because a judge in a remote case made an order from which he dissented.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I made no such statement. I did not say he abandoned the proceedings.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman stated that nothing had been done in the case since.

Mr. NORRIS. Nothing has been done since. I have the word of the Attorney General for that.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has the Attorney General's word for it that nothing has been done. What is the situation? Under the Sherman antitrust law every power conferred by the Constitution of the United States, every power conferred by the laws of evidence invoked every day in the United States courts, every power conferred by this special statute—the Sherman antitrust law—could have been invoked in this particular proceeding, and yet in the face of that fact, because a single order has been made, in which no hardship has resulted, we are asked in the closing hours of this Congress to pass a special piece of legislation changing the rules of proceedings in equity. What would be the consequence of it?

This legislation, I assume, is based either upon an evil that has arisen or a good that will be accomplished. What is the evil? Nothing, except that the order in this case has been made.

Is the Sherman antitrust law destroyed or rendered ineffective? Was it ineffective in the Northern Securities case, in the Standard Oil case, in the Tobacco case, in the Bathtub case, in the National Cash Register case, or in any case in which our Attorney Generals have invoked it for the correction of abuses or the punishment of evil? If it has been found adequate in all these cases, and countless others, there can be no reason why we should pass a bill at this hour setting aside a single statute and making a single exception with reference to the law's procedure that does not apply to all other proceedings in chancery in our United States courts. All laws should be so written that all persons shall be treated alike in our courts and court proceedings.

I am perfectly willing to vote for a bill such as has been introduced by the gentleman from Nebraska, making public all proceedings in equity cases. There is nothing in the order made by the judge in question, and there is nothing in this bill that would prove, although that seems to be the impression sought to be conveyed, that court proceedings are to be stifled or that they are to be conducted in private.

Let us understand exactly what the situation is. There is not a question that can be asked under the law, there is not an answer that can be given under the law, as it exists to-day that can be kept from the public. The purpose of this legislation is to go further, however, and confer not upon the courts, to confer not upon the masters who are vested with the power of ruling upon the competency or their relevancy of evidence, but to confer upon special examiners, who in many cases know little or nothing about the law, the right or the duty to take testimony in pursuance of a dragnet process, and the testimony must be taken and made public, whether relevant or irrelevant to the proceeding. It may be said that a man may refuse to answer, but he refuses to answer at his peril and at least at the risk of extra litigation and delay. Consider the extraordinary length to which this bill will carry us.

All proceedings before, not a master but before an examiner or a special master, shall be open to the public as freely as trials in open court before the court passes upon the legality of the questions or the necessity of the answers. These examiners go into your homes, they go into the prisons, they go into the hospitals, they go into the remotest places in the performance of their duty, and if this statute becomes effective law the public is entitled to invade the prisons, to invade the hospitals, to invade the home, to force itself to the bedside of the sick, to feast their ears upon the testimony of those called upon to testify. It is one of the most unusual propositions that I have ever heard proposed in this or any other Congress in the eight years I have had the honor of serving in this House. For a hundred years the courts of this country have been vested with discretion in matters of this kind, and in the hundred years of our history, Mr. Speaker, not one case has been pointed out here by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] or any other advocate of this bill, in which this discretion has been abused, but simply because of a single case, a recent case happening only within probably the last 60 or 90 days there is a difference between an able attorney general and a conscientious judge, we are called upon to enact special legislation in this Congress, while we deny its wisdom in other cases or at least refuse to make the law general for some reason not clear to the American people. When we legislate, let us legislate for all people alike.

The SPEAKER. The time of the genteman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Nebraska to use some of his time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when this bill first came before the House on the Unanimous Consent Calendar I made an objection to its passage not because I thought the bill went too far, but because I then feared it did not go far enough, and since then I am convinced, like the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that it might not be possible to provide that testimony in all cases should be taken in public. There can be no valid objection to the passage of this bill [applause] except by some one who fears he will be injured by it, not because he ought not to be injured, but because he hopes to derive some benefit from sneaking in the dark. [Applause.] [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from California to use the balance of his time. There will be only one speech on this side of the proposition.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, as I stated before the House took a recess, if this bill could be amended so as to give the examiner or special master the power to pass upon the materiality or competency of the question asked, there would be no objection to the bill whatever. The Attorney General of the United States, in his report of 1912, at page 23, says in express language that the master appointed ought to have the right to pass upon the relevancy of questions. I read from his report:

Suits brought in equity under the Sherman antitrust law for the dissolution of unlawful combinations involve such comprehensive inquiries, the taking of the testimony of so many witnesses, the examination of such manifold and voluminous books, accounts, documents, etc., and they so necessarily require the Government to call hostile and antagonistic witnesses, that it may be doubted whether in many instances they can properly be tried in open court; that is, whether the testimony must not necessarily in almost all cases be taken out of the court, and the case submitted to the court upon testimony so taken. This is especially so in view of the provisions of the expedition act, which requires such cases to be heard by not less than three judges.

To meet this situation, I suggest that provision be made by way of amendment to the expedition act to the effect that where the Attorney General shall file the certificate therein provided for, and shall also certify that, in his opinion, the case is one in which the testimony can not properly be taken under the ordinary provisions of the equity rules, the court shall, on his application, appoint a special master, with power to take the testimony, in the presence of the counsel for the respective parties and such other persons as may choose to attend, and with power to rule on the admission of evidence, and report the facts, together with his opinion thereon, and the evidence so taken to the court, upon the coming in of which report either party may file exceptions thereto, which shall be heard before not less than three judges, who shall determine the case.

That is the thing in a nutshell; if the master appointed shall have the power to pass upon the sufficiency of the question, its materiality, its relevancy, and its competency, there can be no objection whatever to having this hearing in public; but if the master has no such rights and he allows the answer to stand, serious injury can be done to a man who is doing an honest business. Suppose this man owns some secret process which some competitors are trying to get from him. He may have to divulge his method to such competitors unless he can get the protection the amendment which I have suggested would give him. It is a most dangerous proposition, and I hope the House will vote it down.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman in closing referred to the great danger that is going to come to the men whose patent rights are divulged. Does he not know that there is a public record kept of all patent rights, open to every citizen of the United States?

Mr. KAHN. I should have said "secret processes."

Mr. NORRIS. And he refers to the Attorney General's report, when the Attorney General is speaking of an entirely different subject and a different bill. I have introduced a bill on the subject, from the report of which the gentleman read. It gives to the master the power to pass on evidence. I introduced this bill on publicity in the House and it has passed the Senate. They were both prepared in the Attorney General's office, after a great many consultations both with him and his assistants. If the gentleman wants to criticize the Attorney General and wants to question what I have said, I want to read to the House from his report what he said in regard to this particular case, arising in Boston, of the United States versus the United Shoe Machinery Co. He explains what was done, just as I have explained here. He closes by saying:

And no further proceeding has been taken in the case for the reason that I believe—

And that is the Attorney General speaking—

I believe it to be inconsistent with public interests to proceed with the taking of testimony under conditions imposed by the court if relief therefrom can be procured from Congress.

[Applause.]

Is that emphatic enough? Why, gentlemen, I could bring you four or five letters signed by the Attorney General asking me to get this bill up as soon as I could.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not the time. I am in favor of giving to the master the right to pass on the admissibility of evidence. But that is a different proposition. That is in another bill, and that is the bill the Attorney General was talking about in the extract which the gentleman quotes. It has not been reported probably for the reason that the Committee on the Judiciary of this House had most of its time taken up in this session by the proceedings in the impeachment case in the Senate. Why, gentlemen, I have talked with the Attorney General within the last three days over the telephone; I have talked with his various assistants who have had charge of this particular case; and I want to tell you that no man can truthfully say here or elsewhere that the Attorney General is not in earnest and that he does not want this particular bill passed that is now before us.

The gentleman says if I would agree to an amendment, he would not object. Everybody here knows that would mean the death of the legislation. This bill passed unanimously through the Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate; it passed the Senate of the United States; and it came here and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House. There is behind it here now a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary of this body. We know at this late hour if we amended it and sent it back to the Senate we would get no legislation. So all may know just what the Attorney General did say in his report, I quote from it, on pages 21 and 22, as follows:

TAKING TESTIMONY IN ANTITRUST SUITS.

In the equity suit brought against the United Shoe Machinery Co. and others, issue being joined by answers of the defendants, the Government was about proceeding to the taking of testimony before an examiner under the equity rules, when the defendants demanded that the public be excluded from the hearings before the examiner. The Government contended that the public could not properly be so excluded. The defendants thereupon made application to the court for an order in the premises. A certificate having been filed under the terms of the expedition act (32 Stat., 823; as amended, 36 Stats., 854), the matter was heard before Circuit Judges Colt and Putnam and District Judge Brown, of Rhode Island, and an opinion was rendered to the effect that under the terms of United States equity rule 67, providing for the taking of testimony in equity cases before examiners, which examination, it is provided, "shall take place in the presence of the parties or their agents, by their counsel or solicitors * * *," no person other than those mentioned was entitled to be present, and, therefore, that the public should be excluded from the hearings. This direction is not appealable to the Supreme Court. No order has been entered upon the decision, and no further proceeding has been taken in the cause, for the reason that I believe it to be inconsistent with the public interest to proceed with the taking of testimony under the conditions imposed by the court, if relief therefrom can be procured from Congress.

The decision, it appears to me, is based upon a manifest misconception of the nature of the proceedings and the character of the parties. When the Government of the United States is a party to a suit, and particularly to a suit brought under the Sherman antitrust law to prevent unlawful restraints upon interstate commerce or foreign commerce—essentially a matter affecting the public—all the people have a legitimate interest in the proceeding, and are entitled to know just what evidence is being given, and when it is given. The public are the real parties to the suit; and within the text of the rule they are entitled to be present. In the prosecution of defendants charged with monopolizing or attempting to monopolize commerce, it is the experience of the department that the newspaper reports of evidence given in the examination of witnesses often leads to persons having knowledge of the facts furnishing the Government with valuable evidence bearing upon the questions in dispute which otherwise would not be discovered. Even if the court in this case has placed a correct construction upon the law, in my judgment Congress should by statute alter the rule. So far as I have been able to ascertain, this decision is the first one ever rendered in this country which excludes the public from hearing the evidence given in a civil suit to which the Government is a party. The revised equity rules promulgated by the Supreme Court, which take effect February 1 next, repeal rule 67 and provide for taking testimony in equity suits in open court, subject, however, to the right of both parties to take testimony under the provisions of the Revised Statutes, sections 876, 871, and 872. The court is also empowered for good and exceptional cause to depart from the general rule by allowing the deposition of witnesses to be taken before an examiner upon terms specified in the order. But no provision is included in said rules bearing upon the publicity to be allowed on such hearings.

Mr. Speaker, I want to close this debate by appending the report I made on behalf of the Judiciary Committee of this House, as follows:

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report [to accompany S. 8000]:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the bills (H. R. 26749 and S. 8000) providing for publicity in taking evidence under the Sherman antitrust law, have duly considered the same and report S. 8000 back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

These two bills are exactly the same and provide that the hearings before any examiner or special master appointed to take testimony in all equity suits brought by the United States under the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, commonly known as the Sherman antitrust law, shall be public the same as trials in open court. It is the universal practice in all equity suits brought by the United States Government under this act for the court to appoint a master to take the testimony. As a general rule this master is, in effect, a traveling court, and he has to go to various parts of the country to take the evidence. In most cases under this act the taking of the evidence consumes several months of time. Until a short time ago it was always supposed that the taking of testimony by such master was a public function and that the rules regarding the publicity of courts generally applied to such master. In all the cases that have ever been commenced by the Government under this act, until very recently, there never was any attempt made to have such hearings held in secret.

Last year, however, in the case of The United States v. The United Shoe Machinery Co. of New Jersey et al., pending in the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, after a master had been appointed to take testimony in the usual way, the defendants objected to the taking of such testimony by the master in public, and the question was submitted to that court. After an exhaustive hearing and the filing of briefs by the parties to the suit, the court issued an order that the public should be excluded from such hearings and that the same should be private. This seems to have been the first time that the question was ever raised, and if the decision of this court stands, and no legislation is had thereon by Congress, there is no doubt but what the Government in all equity suits under this act will be met at the threshold with an application on the part of the defendant for the taking of the evidence in private. It must be remembered that in all these cases the Government of the United States is a party. In reality the people of the country are plaintiffs in the suit, and the taking of the evidence in secret, either by the court or any master representing the court, is not only contrary to the fundamental idea of our jurisprudence, but it would often result in a denial of justice. Everything pertaining to our courts should have the greatest publicity. Secret hearings would surround our courts with a mystery of doubt and eventually bring them into disrepute. If our courts are to retain the confidence and respect of the country generally, their official conduct must be entirely free from any suspicion of star-chamber proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the Senate bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

CONDEMNED CANNON AND CANNON BALLS.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 8273, with House amendments, and three other amendments which I send to the Clerk's desk. I ask that the bill be read by its title.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 8273) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donation of condemned cannon and cannon balls.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, this is quite a lengthy bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with, as it only authorizes the Secretary of War to give cannon to certain towns and Army posts throughout the country without expense to the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the bill ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? If not, a second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment, which I will request that the Clerk will read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to modify this bill by the paper which he sends to the desk. The Clerk will report it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify the bill by the insertion of an amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend the bill by providing that there be donated one brass cannon——

Mr. MANN. An amendment must be in writing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask the gentleman to withhold his demand for the writing of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill as modified.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

DEDICATION OF STATUE TO THOMAS JEFFERSON AT ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 709.

Whereas the president of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Co. has informed the Senate that with the approval of Congress, as expressed by an act of March 4, 1909, the Louisiana Purchase Exposition has erected upon the site of the world's fair in the city of St. Louis a memorial to Thomas Jefferson, at a cost of $450,000, in commemoration of the acquisition of the Louisiana territory; and

Whereas this statue of Mr. Jefferson is to be unveiled and dedicated on the one hundred and tenth anniversary of the signing of the Louisiana Purchase treaty, the 30th of April, 1913; and

Whereas the trustees in charge of this great memorial have, through the president of the exposition company, requested the presence of a committee of the House of Representatives to participate in the dedicatory services on the day named, to the end that the House make proper recognition of said invitation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of 12 members of the House of Representatives be appointed by the Speaker of the House to attend said ceremonies and represent the House of Representatives at the unveiling and dedication of said memorial.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. I could not understand whether the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was asking unanimous consent for this or moving to suspend the rules.

Mr. HEFLIN. I moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. COX. I demand a second.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] has 20.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] will not oppose the passage of this resolution. It provides for the appointment of 12 Members of the House—the Senate having already provided for the appointment of a delegation from that body—to go down to St. Louis on the 30th of April next and witness the unveiling of a monument to the greatest Democrat in the memory of man, Thomas Jefferson. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. COX. I see the bill carries no appropriation. Is it intended that the Members appointed by the Speaker shall pay their own expenses?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not certain about that. There is nothing said in the resolution about it.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman know any fund or any way whereby they can get their expenses repaid?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will be very frank and state to the gentleman that, so far as I am concerned, I would be willing to have Congress pay the expenses of a delegation going from this Congress to witness the unveiling of a monument to a man who has done so much for humanity as Thomas Jefferson has. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. I have asked the gentleman a question. He answers, of course, in his own way, but not to my satisfaction.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman would not like to have me answer it in his way, would he?

Mr. COX. With the gentleman's permission, I will put the question again. Does the gentleman know any way or any fund out of which the Members thus appointed can be paid their expenses?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not certain about there being any fund. There may be. I trust that there is. I do not know about that. It would probably take an appropriation by Congress. I want to say to my friend who has asked me a question, but who is now listening to suggestions from some one else, if he will listen to me, I will enlighten him. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will give attention to the gentleman from Alabama. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if this committee could not hike it, as Gen. Rosalie Jones did? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am pretty certain that my friend does not intend to oppose this resolution, nor do I believe any gentleman on this floor will oppose it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I want to say, in response to that, that I will not oppose it unless it is proposed that this junketing party shall be paid for at public expense. If that be the proposition, I shall oppose it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will say, for the information and consolation of my friend, that it has been suggested to me that it will take an appropriation to pay the expenses of these gentlemen. If such an appropriation is proposed, then the gentlemen can raise his point and put himself on record as opposed to junketing trips.

Mr. COX. I will do it right now for that matter.

Mr. HEFLIN. But I do not consider the sending of a delegation of Congressmen to the unveiling of a monument to Thomas Jefferson as being a junketing trip. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from St. Louis, Mr. DYER, and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution, called up by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, was introduced into the House of Representatives by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] on January 28, 1913, and by me favorably reported to the House from the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions February 5, 1913, and it is as follows:

Whereas the president of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Co. has informed the Senate that, with the approval of Congress, as expressed by an act of March 4, 1909, the Louisiana Purchase Exposition has erected upon the site of the world's fair in the city of St. Louis a memorial to Thomas Jefferson, at a cost of $450,000, in commemoration of the acquisition of the Louisiana territory; and

Whereas this statue of Mr. Jefferson is to be unveiled and dedicated on the one hundred and tenth anniversary of the signing of the Louisiana Purchase treaty, the 30th of April, 1913; and

Whereas the trustees in charge of this great memorial have, through the president of the exposition company, requested the presence of a committee of the House of Representatives to participate in the dedicatory services on the day named, to the end that the House make proper recognition of said invitation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of 12 Members of the House of Representatives be appointed by the Speaker of the House to attend said ceremonies and represent the House of Representatives at the unveiling and dedication of said memorial.

Mr. Speaker, the money that has been used to build this monument and memorial to Thomas Jefferson, amounting to $450,000, was contributed in part by this Government out of money which it donated to the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, to the extent of $150,000. An additional $150,000 was contributed by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Co., and an additional $150,000, making a total of $450,000, was contributed by the city of St. Louis.

This monument is a splendid memorial to Thomas Jefferson, and, in addition, it is to contain the archives of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition.

One of the greatest events in the history of this country was the acquisition of the Louisiana Purchase, and we of the city of St. Louis look upon this coming event of next April as one of national importance. The Senate of the United States has already appointed a committee to go to St. Louis on the 30th of April to witness and participate in this dedication. It would to us be humiliating, indeed, if the House of Representatives should fail to send a committee to participate, not in a local celebration, not in a junket, but an event that is the crowning glory of that great exposition.

To my mind, as a Member on this side of the House, Thomas Jefferson was one of the greatest Democratic statesmen that this country has ever produced. [Applause.] If there is any other to equal him, it is that great Missourian who to-day occupies the next to the highest office in this land, the Speaker of this House. [Loud applause.]

We Missourians, regardless of party, ought to have at least something that we might console ourselves with on the 4th of March. [Laughter and applause.] We feel, Mr. Speaker, when we go up the Avenue here and witness the scenes about this Chamber that a great event is to happen the day after to-morrow, and we of Missouri, regardless of party, believe that the ablest man in the history of that State, the greatest Democrat of to-day, as Jefferson was in his day, and the one who should have the right to be exalted on the 4th of March is Missouri's favorite son, the Hon. CHAMP CLARK. [Loud applause.]

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the time that this applause has taken will not be taken out of my time. [Laughter.] I wish, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution might be unanimously adopted, as this monument and memorial will further emphasize to America the great national importance of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition held at St. Louis, and to the committee who shall come to St. Louis on April 30 for the dedication we will show them one of the most splendid memorials, not only to a great man, but one which will further teach the people of this country that the Louisiana Purchase was one of the, if not the greatest, events in the history of America. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, at the risk of being called unpatriotic, as well as un-Democratic, I wish to enter my protest against this resolution unless this junketing party proposes to pay its own expenses. I know, and know full well, that I will be criticized for entering this protest and will be called a cheeseparing Member of Congress in raising my voice in protest to it. But what good will it do? What benefit will inure to the great mass of the American people? To what extent will it tend to immortalize the name of the great Thomas Jefferson by sending a bunch of Members of Congress there at public expense, with no other purpose on earth than to have a good junketing party at public expense?

I wonder whether the gentleman in charge of this bill would object to an amendment providing that the Members appointed to take this journey shall bear their own expense? I realize full well that the temper of the House this evening is such that it is a mere waste of breath to protest against this resolution. I saw it demonstrated this evening. A few men on this side of the House have stood here for the past few weeks, in season and out of season, talking and voting economy, and yet this evening when the minority leader threw a challenge full and fair in the faces of us Democrats upon a small matter I saw my own party stand up here and go back upon the things they have stood for within the last 18 months.

The man that will stand on the floor of this House and talk for the men who are going to pay the bill in the last analysis does not get very far. I realize that he has not very many auditors to sit and listen to him. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] time and time again has called the attention of this side of the House to the enormous appropriation bills that were passing through here, and as certain as election day rolls around in 1914—let us be not deceived—the people are going to call us to account for it.

If this measure served any good or any benefit to the people, I would be the last man on the floor of the House to oppose it. But no benefit, no results, will be added to the honor, glory, grandeur, and greatness of Jefferson. Shall the Congress of the United States, merely because it has been asked and invited by the trustees of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, send 24 men from Washington City to St. Louis, when later on they will be called upon to pay bills of two or three thousand dollars for their expenses? I protest against it. I protest against it because no good will come to the people. I protest against it because it will not add one iota to the greatness of Jefferson. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, how much time did the gentleman from Indiana consume?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman consume some more of his time.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. COX. That is as to whether or not the gentleman in charge of the bill would consent to have this amendment incorporated in his resolution:

Provided, Said Members of the House appointed under this resolution shall bear their own expenses.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has 20 minutes at his disposal in which to express his views on this matter. I realize the importance of time, and I do not want to consume it unnecessarily. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] represents the district in which this monument has been erected, and I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] is about the only man in the House who wants to oppose the resolution.

Mr. COX. That might be.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not authorized to open the resolution for amendment. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is the Member who reported the resolution from my committee. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], the gentleman's colleague, was the chairman of the subcommittee, the author of the resolution.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I put the question to the gentleman because he is in charge of the resolution on the floor of the House.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, there ought not to be a single vote cast against this resolution. The Louisiana purchase was one of the greatest events in the history of our country. A great domain of approximately 400,000,000 acres was purchased for $15,000,000, or about 3 cents an acre. It was obtained by the wisdom and statesmanship of Thomas Jefferson. That great historical event was fittingly celebrated in the city of St. Louis nine years ago, 100 years after the purchase of that great domain. The great exposition celebrating that event was one of the greatest world's fairs this country has ever seen, and one of the most successful. This Government participated in that exposition and contributed materially toward its success. It even loaned the Louisiana Purchase Exposition management $4,600,000, and to the surprise of this Congress and of the country the exposition company paid back every dollar of that loan.

After the exposition was over and money had been made, instead of distributing it among the stockholders it was proposed to expend the money in building a monument upon the grounds where the exposition was held—a great memorial—to Thomas Jefferson, whose wisdom and statesmanship had procured that great domain. It is now proposed by the management of that exposition company on April 30 next, the anniversary of this great and important event, to unveil and dedicate that monument. It will certainly be appropriate for the Government to participate, and Congress should be represented on that great occasion. I do not know whether there will ever be an effort made to appropriate money to pay the expenses of the delegates who may go there, but if there should be it is time enough to fight that appropriation when the proposition is made. This resolution does not ask for or appropriate a dollar. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. So far as I am concerned, I am willing that this resolution should be passed and that the men should go there at their own expense or at the expense of the Government, as may hereafter be determined.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I live close to the city of St. Louis. I regard it as one of the greatest cities of the country. Its citizens are an enterprising people and I commend them for building this monument to the great American citizen. The district I have the honor to represent extends within a few miles of the city of St. Louis. I believe as much as any man in this House in the principles of government as laid down by Thomas Jefferson, but I also believe that Thomas Jefferson never taught the American Congress that they ought to provide junketing trips for Members of Congress to go 1,000 miles from home. He did teach economy in governmental affairs and believed in lightening the burdens of those who toil. It is all very well that men should appear at St. Louis at the unveiling of this monument to do honor to the name of Jefferson, but let us have some regard for the taxpayers, too, when a thing is useless.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. How did the gentleman vote on the question of the memorial to Abraham Lincoln?

Mr. FOSTER. I voted the other day to locate the memorial in Potomac Park, the same as the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. For $2,000,000?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. The original bill carried that amount, which passed some time ago.

Mr. JAMES. And yet the gentleman is raising a row about paying the expenses of some gentlemen who may attend to celebrate the unveiling of a monument to Thomas Jefferson. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I did not vote for any junketing trips in honor of Abraham Lincoln. I voted for a real monument to that great man, who did so much for this Union, and I would be willing to vote for a real monument to Thomas Jefferson that would do honor to his memory, but not to pay money out of the United States Treasury to send men out on a junketing trip over the country. That is not honoring the name of Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Would the gentleman from Kentucky be willing to be appointed on this committee, at his own expense, and show his patriotism toward his country and honor toward Thomas Jefferson by paying his own expenses to the city of St. Louis?

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for an answer?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the Senator from Kentucky. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. I do.

Mr. JAMES. I want to ask the gentleman this question: So far as the gentleman from Kentucky is concerned, he does not expect to be a member of this committee, and would not accept a place upon this committee, but I regard it as a cheap appeal to the spirit of demagogy for a man to assert upon this floor that the Congress of the United States ought to send a delegation of its membership to the unveiling of a monument to the greatest Democrat this world ever grew and say that they ought to pay their own expenses. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I have not asked anyone to go, but, in the opinion of the gentleman from Kentucky, it may be demagogy to save to those who labor in season and out of season, those who earn their bread by the sweat of their faces, who must go down in their pockets to pay the expenses of the Government, to come here to this Congress and say to the American people it is demagogy when you want to save that tax to the American people. Mr. Speaker, that I should stand upon this floor and be characterized by the Senator from Kentucky that it is cheap demagogy for me to do that, I say to him I glory in the distinction that he gives me. [Applause.] I have heard the gentleman from Kentucky appeal to Members of this House and appeal to the country to lighten the burdens that are upon the backs of the American people. Is he so soon to forget his appeal when he is about to leave this House?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. COX. I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. And yet we are told here to-night by the gentleman from Kentucky, after his long service in this House, which has been a distinguished service, that in asking that the burdens be taken off those who toil, that any man who stands upon the floor of this House and asks to save something, though it may be small, to the people, is engaged in cheap demagogy. [Applause.] I welcome the name he gives me, as I am trying to save money to the Treasury. I say to him, go back to his home in Kentucky and tell the people there that he has voted to take from their pockets and from their earnings to pay for a junketing trip for men who do not honor the name of Thomas Jefferson more than he is honored at this time. Mr. Speaker, I realize that it is not a large matter, that the appropriation, if made, would not be large, yet I believe that I have the right to stand upon the floor as one Member and protest against such a useless appropriation. It is easy to be patriotic in spending money when it comes out of the pocket of some one else. Real patriotism means to save to those who pay the taxes whenever possible to do so. It means economy with other people's money.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER].

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I am against this bill because the bill is trying to obtain money under false pretenses. [Laughter.] I am against this bill because, as the Senator from Kentucky rightly said, it is a foregone conclusion that Congress will eventually pay the expenses of the delegation. Moreover I remember about a year ago the gentleman from Indiana opposed the raising of wages of Government clerks from $600 to $720 on the pretext of economy, and on this occasion he is willing to spend money on a junketing trip without even stating what the sum is to be——

Mr. COX. The gentleman says "the gentleman from Indiana."

Mr. BERGER. I mean Mr. CULLOP, who is the author of the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. I have only three minutes and I can not yield to the gentleman from Alabama unless you give me time. Thomas Jefferson needs no monument of stone or brick. He has built a different kind of monument for himself. I really believe if Thomas Jefferson lived to-day he would oppose a bill of this kind. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KINDRED. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BERGER. I can not because I have not the time. If we proceed in this way then we might send a delegation of 12 Representatives to St. Louis this week to the unveiling of a statue of Jefferson, one next month to New York to the unveiling of a statue of Hamilton, and then one again to San Francisco for some similar occasion. The bill establishes a bad precedent, if it should pass, and there will be no end to our spending money for junkets. Therefore I am against the bill.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Alabama use some of his time? I have only four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has four minutes and the gentleman from Alabama seven minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the memorial to Thomas Jefferson, of which we speak, has been reared in the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor. As far as we know, it is the only memorial that has ever been erected upon American soil to the memory of Thomas Jefferson, and I think it would be fitting, indeed, if this ceremony, which is to take place on the 30th of April, would be clothed with the dignity of national representation.

Of course, we in St. Louis could easily pay the expenses of these gentlemen, but it never occurred to us that there would be anyone in Congress who would refuse to lend national dignity to this affair by sending the delegation on behalf and in the name of the American Congress at the expense of the United States Government. [Applause.] This memorial, Mr. Speaker, is not a simple affair. It is going to contain the archives of Thomas Jefferson. It is going to be a counterpart to that splendid memorial which is to be erected on the banks of the Potomac to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, and could you imagine a more fitting place for a Jefferson memorial than in the city of St. Louis, the great metropolis in the territory of the Louisiana Purchase, a great achievement of Thomas Jefferson, if not the very greatest, in his illustrious career. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in all frankness, is it not about time to stop the practice of stigmatizing as a junket every official participation of Representatives of the national legislative body in celebrations like the one now under discussion? Such practice, in my judgment, detracts from the dignity of Congress and belittles this great body in the eyes of the people. I do not believe that Congress ever did authorize anything that might with justice be termed a junket, for that term implies participation by Congress in an event having an unnecessary or unworthy purpose. The proposed Jefferson celebration at St. Louis is intended to subserve a great national purpose. It will be the culmination of the greatest international exposition ever held in this or any other country and a last and fitting tribute by the present generation to commemorate one of the greatest events in America's history. The people of St. Louis, I believe, are really entitled to the gratitude of the Nation for their patriotic contribution to the number of great American monuments and for the opportunity they are giving Congress to participate in this national celebration. I hope the resolution will pass without a dissenting vote. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] going to use all of his time in which to close?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like the gentleman to use some of his time.

Mr. COX. There is going to be only one more speech on this side.

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, there is existing in this House a disease with certain gentlemen that we might call "economitis." It is spasmodic and for home consumption.

These gentlemen, in their crust-paring speeches, remind me of the story of the negro who went to his boss man after slavery time and told him that he was going to get a divorce from his wife. The boss man said to him: "Sam, you have not been married more than two weeks. Do you want a divorce already?" "Yes, sah; I have got to have a divo'ce." "What is the trouble?" "Well, all the time it is money, money, money." "You better go and try to live together." "No, sah, Boss, I cain't live with that nigger." "Tell me what the trouble is." "Well, ev'ry time I comes home its money, money, money, all de time." "Well, what does she do with it?" "Gawd knows, Boss; I habn't given her none yit." [Laughter.]

And that seems to be the case here. We haven't given any yet for a monument to Jefferson. We erect monuments to Washington, Lincoln, Sherman, Columbus, and others, but not a monument has been erected to Thomas Jefferson, the greatest man this country has ever produced. And I think it comes with bad grace on the part of Democrats to oppose this measure, when, in point of fact, it does not appropriate or carry a single dollar of Government funds. But even if it did carry an appropriation to bear this expense it would not exceed $250 or $300. And the idea of Representatives standing on the floor of this House and opposing this measure, when the people of that section have done such a magnificent thing as to expend $450,000 to erect a magnificent monument to Thomas Jefferson, and object to such a meritorious thing, should not appeal to Democrats, at least.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, just a word. I was not insensible to the fact that I would lay myself open to severe criticism and censure because I raised this protest. I am perfectly willing to bear the odium. I am perfectly willing to bear the censure; aye, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to be called a demagogue by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]—perfectly willing to accept it—and if my statements and my conduct on the floor of this House in standing for economy be demagogy, let the gentleman from Kentucky take it back to his native State and make the most of it. Time and time again I have heard his loud voice, as he stood on the floor of this House, shouting, talking about lifting the burdens—lifting the burdens—from the great common people of this country. [Laughter.]

No man, from his infancy up to this hour, has been a more consistent follower or believer in the doctrine taught by Thomas Jefferson than I have. One of the cardinal principles of the doctrine of Jefferson was that no money should be taken from the Public Treasury except it be for the public use, and then to the end only that the burdens of labor might be lessened.

Something has been injected here about the great World's Fair at St. Louis. I remember it developed here in the discussion on the floor of this House the other day, and I took occasion to look it up. The American people were taxed, in round numbers, $5,000,000 to maintain that exposition, which was never refunded to them. After all, Mr. Speaker, it simply boils itself down to the one proposition, Shall we pass this bill for the sole and express purpose of giving 12 men a junketing trip?

It is perfectly apparent, perfectly patent and plain to anyone, that later on Congress will be asked to appropriate money to pay this expense, because I put the query to the gentleman in charge of the bill a moment ago, whether or not he would consent that an amendment be incorporated here, precluding the expense, and he evaded the question, showing that he was unwilling that the amendment should be incorporated here.

I have no objection to the entire membership of the House and Senate going to the unveiling of that monument if they are willing to go there at their own expense.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] may criticize economy all he pleases, but let me inform him, Mr. Speaker, that he would not talk that way if he lived in the State of Indiana, where he had to go up against the real steel of a Republican Party. He would be called on the green carpet there to render an account of his stewardship here. He would be called upon to answer to the question, "Why did you vote this out of the Public Treasury?" if he lived where he had a Republican after him 24 hours of every day, making him explain these things. I can understand why he is willing to run his arms into the Treasury of the United States. It is because he has no opposition.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired, and he can not yield for a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes, the remainder of my time, to that great Democrat from Kentucky, OLLIE JAMES. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I have heard of Democrats of different grades [laughter], but I never expected to hear of a Democrat who would undertake to economize at the expense of the glory of the father of Democracy. [Applause.] My distinguished twin brothers of one-cent economy, who sit in front of me [laughter], protest they are terribly aroused lest the memory of that great man who wrote that chart of human liberty that has been transcribed into every language of the earth and has nerved the arm of peoples in distant lands to fight for liberty [applause] should be held lightly; and yet these gentlemen would ask the great American Congress of the greatest Republic in all the tide of time to be so cheap, to be so stingy, as to send, at their own expense or not at all, its delegation to the city of St. Louis, a city whose magnanimous democracy had willingly given from their own pockets $450,000 to erect this statue—to be so miserly that we would not send a delegation of our own there unless they paid their own expenses. [Applause.] The delegation goes, if it goes at all, to represent the Nation, in its honor, its glory, its dignity, yea, its gratitude, to the one who founded it. They go at our command; we should defray their expenses. Why, gentlemen, let me tell you, there is no man upon this floor that has struggled more for economy than I have, but I have battled that that economy shall come in a sane way; but it can not come from the petty tactics of gentlemen here who would undertake to go back home and say to the great democracy, "Send me back to Congress; I kept a delegation from going from the Congress of the United States to participate in the unveiling of a monument to the memory of the great Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, the father of Democracy, the evangel of freedom." [Great applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and this resolution passed?

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. Evidently two-thirds having voted in the affirmative——

Mr. COX. A division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I myself was about to ask for a division. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Both of you can get it. Those in favor of suspending the rules and passing this resolution will rise in their places and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Two hundred and five gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-one gentlemen have risen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 205 and the noes are 21. Two-thirds having voted in the affimative, the rules are suspended and the resolution is agreed to. [Applause.]

SUPERVISION OF THE LINCOLN MEMORIAL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my colleague [Mr. CANNON], who is engaged in a conference committee, and at his request and with my own hearty support, I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the House the bill (S. 8589) relating to the supervision of the Lincoln Memorial, for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House Senate bill 8589. The Clerk will report it.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the exercise of its control and direction for the construction of the Lincoln Memorial, authorized by act of Congress approved February 9, 1911, the commission created by said act shall designate to perform the duty of special resident commissioner to represent the commission in the oversight of the work the Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM, who, at the time of the adoption of this act, is the senior member of the commission in continuous service of the United States; and for the special service of the member so designated he shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 a year out of the appropriations for the construction of such memorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on the bill relating to publicity in the taking of evidence be granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all Members who spoke on the bill referred to by him shall have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks on the Jefferson memorial resolution.

Mr. EDWARDS. I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ROBERT N. CAMPBELL.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6877) to reinstate Robert N. Campbell as a first lieutenant in the Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Robert N. Campbell a first lieutenant in the Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army, to take rank next after First Lieut. Robert O. Edwards, Coast Artillery Corps, the said Robert N. Campbell having served for a period of eight years and six months, from June, 1902, to December, 1910.

SEC. 2. That the said Robert N. Campbell shall receive no pay or emolument except from the date of his appointment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been unanimously reported——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SABATH. I object.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. SABATH. I demand a second.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering a second as ordered?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] 20 minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that was unanimously reported to the Senate, passed the Senate by a unanimous vote, came to the House, and is now up for passage. A similar bill has been introduced in the House, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and favorably reported by the unanimous vote of that committee, and its passage is recommended by the Secretary of War. In a letter to the Committee on Military Affairs, the Secretary of War states:

He was educated for the service, and while in it was an excellent officer. It is believed to be to the advantage of the United States, and would violate the rights of no officer now in the service, should Mr. Campbell be again commissioned as provided in House bill 24739. Favorable action is accordingly recommended by the War Department.

The President of the United States is constantly appointing men from private life to fill vacancies in the Army. This young man has been out of the service for six years. He was educated at West Point, and has had six or eight years practical experience in the Army, where his record was excellent. Now the Government needs his services.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman explain to me why he went out of the service?

Mr. AUSTIN. He went out voluntarily, resigned to enter business.

Mr. SABATH. And has failed in business, has he not?

Mr. AUSTIN. He has not failed in business.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What does the gentleman from Tennessee propose to do?

Mr. AUSTIN. To reinstate him in the Army.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. At what grade?

Mr. AUSTIN. He was a first lieutenant when he resigned.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. And you are going to restore him as first lieutenant?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; when he tendered his resignation it was to take charge of a large estate owned by some relative, but that having been settled and disposed of, he proposes now to reenter the service of the United States.

Mr. SABATH. How old is he?

Mr. AUSTIN. He graduated from West Point in 1902—I should say he was thirty-one or two years of age, right in the prime of life. He is well known to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], of the Military Affairs Committee, which reported this bill. He belongs to a prominent family at Johnson City, Tenn. He has all the confidence of the officers under whom he served.

Mr. HARDWICK. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Government needs officers in the Army?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. And that we haven't got enough now, but have to appoint more?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is the gentleman positive about that?

Mr. AUSTIN. We held an examination last year for appointments.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; we do that. But I mean at this particular time.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, they are constantly appointing officers, because there are vacancies occurring all the time.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, it happens that I know this young man, and I know something of the circumstances under which he went out of the Army. He went out to take up business. He did not fail in business, but after attending to some special work that he went out to do, the call of the Army was such that it drew him back irresistibly, and he began at once to seek to return to the work for which he had been educated. I think it commendable on his part that he should seek to go back into the service which he ought not to have left.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I notice that you say he shall be reinstated after Lieut. Robert O. Edwards. Do you mean to bracket this man and carry him up and let him lose nothing by this six or eight years' absence?

Mr. TILSON. He has not been out of the service for six or eight years.

Mr. HOWARD. How long has he been out of the service?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know, exactly.

Mr. MANN. He resigned December 31, 1910.

Mr. HOWARD. Have any promotions been made in the service since that time?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, undoubtedly a number of files have been advanced.

Mr. HOWARD. And this man Edwards is in the same position now as this man would have been in if he had stayed in the service. Is that true?

Mr. TILSON Every man behind him will be held back one file.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. May I ask the gentleman why he should not take the place that he would have if he was just appointed?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman must understand that by so doing he would be placed below the rank of those that went out with him, the men in the class with him, and so down.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Why should not he be, as he has not been in the service of the United States for three years?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the man stood an examination he would have to go below these men.

Mr. TILSON. If he went in that way, he would begin all over again and would have to enter as a second lieutenant.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why should not he; he was out all this time?

Mr. TILSON. He has had all of the training up to this point as a first lieutenant.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but he ought not to take the rank that is given him by this bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does the gentleman think he ought to take the place of those who have been in the service all along?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, the reinstatement of an officer either in the Army or the Navy or the Marine Corps, ordinarily, when he quit of his own volition is a dangerous precedent to set. In May, 1911, I introduced in this House a bill for the reinstatement of Lieut. Col. Constantine Marast Perkins, of Georgia, who was Dreyfused out of the service, charged with mental incapacity for the discharge of the duties of his rank. It was a blot upon the history of the American Navy, and it was so stated by the entire Committee on Naval Affairs in making the report to the House. Time and time again, with all the evidence in this case showing that certain officers of the Marine Corps had an ulterior motive in Dreyfussing this man out of the service, I have tried to have this Congress do justice to this officer, who served 32 years for his country and on every occasion demonstrated his courage and unusual fitness to command men. Yet the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has invariably objected, and this officer has been kept from enjoying the rights of a brave soldier in the service of his country. This man did not go out voluntarily, but involuntarily, and as the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi who made the report for the Naval Committee in the case said, "This is one dark blot on the luster of the American Navy," and it should be removed. Yet in the face of this unanimous report, in the face of the report from the Marine Corps and from the Navy Department, I have been unable to persuade the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this gallant officer ought to go back into the service. I do not feel that I would be just to this chivalrous Georgian if I stood in my place and allowed a man of wealth, a man of prestige, to be reinstated, when he resigned from his post after having received an education at an expense of $18,000 on the part of the Government.

If this man goes back in the service, this splendid officer who was kicked out of the American Navy will go back. We can not make fish of one and fowl of another. The officer this bill seeks to restore has been out of the service a year or two years, as the gentleman from Illinois says. They bracketed this man, and they carried him as an extra number, and he goes on up. He does not lose one solitary, single day in his longevity pay, and I am against any effort on the part of any gentleman on the floor of this House to reinstate this man, because I am thoroughly convinced that there is not a more worthy case pending in Congress than the case of Lieut. Col. Perkins.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, for seven long weeks, day in and day out, Republican and Democratic Members heard the testimony in this case. The department reversed itself; and for the personal reason that somebody will probably be skinned if this gallant officer is reinstated, I have been balked in meting out justice to this man in the American Congress. You come in here with these personal bills for reinstatement. This man voluntarily resigned from the service. He was in a position to resign. I do not know whether he has made a failure in business or not. I have no disparaging word for this young man who seeks to go back into the service he loves, but I do say it is unjust to keep this bill of Col. Perkins on the Private Calendar for nearly two years, and for one man not to allow Congress to consider it for one single moment.

Col. Perkins will go back in the service if I live. He has proven the finding of the retiring board in his case to be a gross calumny. The Judge Advocate General of the Navy Department, who reviewed the testimony submitted, reversed its findings and said it had nothing upon which to base its judgment.

Col. Perkins is in the prime of lafe, magnificently equipped professionally, mentally, and physically to again discharge the duties of his beloved profession which he discharged so efficiently and so faithfully for 32 years without one blot upon it. Oh, if I had the time, how I could uncover the skeletons in the closets of those who perpetrated this outrage.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to provide for the reinstatement of an officer in the Army. There is no information contained in the report on the Senate bill except a reference to a report upon a House bill somewhat similar, and there is scarcely any information in the report on the House bill. The House bill proposes to reinstate this officer to take rank next after First Lieut. John G. Holtz. The Senate bill proposes to reinstate him to take rank next after First Lieut. Robert O.

Edwards. There has been not a suggestion made in the report or elsewhere to indicate why the officer should be reinstated to take rank after either one of these gentlemen, and no reason given for the change of the opinion of the committee that first recommended that the officer take rank, if reinstated, after Holtz and later that he should take rank after Edwards. In the House bill as originally introduced there was provision that this officer should have the benefit, when reinstated, of longevity pay based on the time he had been out of the Army as well as upon the time he has been in the Army. That probably represents his feeling and attitude in reference to the Army.

This man was sent to the Military Academy and graduated from there in 1906. My recollection is that the boys who go to the academy sign an agreement that they will serve in the Army for a period of time. May I ask some member of the Military Affairs Committee how long they do agree to serve?

Mr. AUSTIN. My recollection is, so far as the Navy is concerned, that it is eight years, including the four years time in the Naval Academy, and I think the same rule applies to the Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is four years.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was six years, and I still think it is six.

Mr. KAHN. It is four years.

Mr. MANN. I accept the gentleman's statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the gentleman for accepting the statement of the gentleman from California instead of mine.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I had another subsequent statement after the gentleman from Tennessee had informed me. If he was to serve four years, he served four years and then resigned. Having resigned, if he wants to go back in the Army let him go back without taking the place or numbers of any man who remained in the Army. He wants to go back in and displace in number some man who remained in the Army. These men who were educated at the expense of the Government and then leave the service while they are still boys to try their business capacity and find they have not business capacity, if they want to go back in the Army they ought not to displace in numbers the men who remain in the service of the Army. It is not treating the man who stays in fairly. This man asks to go back in the same place that he held when he went out. It ought not to be allowed, and the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], who reported this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is unduly alarmed about this matter. The fact is that the House Committee on Military Affairs first reported this bill providing that Mr. Campbell should have virtually the same place that he would have had if he had not resigned from the Army. He resigned only a short time before this bill was originally introduced, and at the time there were only a few numbers between where he was when he left the military service and where he would have been if he had been put back again. Now, between the time the bill was first reported to the House and the time it was reported to the Senate, there were many numbers intervening, and, therefore, the Senate amended the bill by putting Mr. Campbell, not ahead of any other officer, but where he would be if he were to go in the Army to-day. In other words, Mr. Campbell has lost some 70 numbers by reason of his being out of the Army only about two years. He goes back considerably behind his class; almost two years behind his class. Mr. Campbell is a fine officer. He made an excellent record at West Point; was a good officer in the Army, and a gentleman of the highest standing and integrity. He is from my State. I know him personally, and am sure if he is reinstated in the Army we will make no mistake in putting him back. This bill was sent to the War Department. Mr. Campbell had good reasons for resigning, and they were family reasons. The matter was laid before the War Department, and there is a recommendation from the War Department that Mr. Campbell be reinstated in the service of the Army. He is a capable and efficient officer, and the War Department desires his services.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will.

Mr. SABATH. Does the report show where there is such a recommendation?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think the Senate report is full, but the report of the House Committee on Military Affairs shows all the facts. The gentleman from Illinois was correct about the report not being in full, and it does not show the numbers that Mr. Campbell lost, but as a matter of fact he did lose about 70 numbers, as can be seen by looking at the Army Register, and he is certainly entitled to go back into the Army, because he had been educated at great expense by the Government—some $19,000 in all—is a robust man, and the Army officials desire his return.

Mr. SABATH. Why did not he remain there if he was educated at this great expense?

Mr. McKELLAR. Because of deaths in his family, and he had to go home to make a living for those who were dependent upon him.

Mr. HOWARD. If the gentleman will permit, I thoroughly agree with him that these able-bodied men under ordinary circumstances ought to go back in the service. Does he go to the tail of the list or is not he a bracketed number and carried up ahead of a whole lot of men who stayed in the service?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; he is not put ahead of anyone.

Mr. HOWARD. Why does the gentleman specify in this bill that he is to be reinstated next after a certain man if he is not a bracketed number?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the gentleman will examine the Army Register, he will find he is the last of the list.

Mr. HOWARD. That is a complete answer if he is the last.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is, shall the rules be suspended and this bill passed.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in the affirmative——

Mr. SABATH. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided.

The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 115, the noes are 39; two-thirds having voted——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to make a point of no quorum——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] rise?

Mr. MANN. To reserve the right to make a point of no quorum for a moment.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the point of no quorum has been made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD].

Mr. MANN. I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, it is a very delicate matter to make a point of no quorum at this time in the session. Probably a quorum would not be secured, and I shall not make the point of no quorum on this bill. But if any other bills of this character come before the House, it will require a quorum to be present in order to pass them.

Mr. SLAYDEN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] rise?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the Speaker refer to me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was addressing the Chair.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But I did not think the Chair recognized that fact. I want to make a suggestion as to the observation made by the gentleman from Illinois. There is behind this bill one other bill that I happen to be advised about, which is not like this in the essential points, but is like it in that it proposes to take a man now on the retired list and put him to work for the Government. He is drawing three-quarters pay.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What is the point before the House?

The SPEAKER. Nothing at all.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] made a point of order a moment ago that there was not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman from Ohio, and the gentleman from Ohio did not rise from his seat.

Mr. COX. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not too late?

Mr. SPEAKER. Not in the condition of affairs at present.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Did I understand the Speaker a moment ago to say that he did not hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], who did make the point of order?

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference whether the Chair heard him or not. The gentleman from Indiana himself has made the point of order.

Mr. COX. If I can not make the point of order on the bill that went through a moment ago I will withdraw——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has already made the point of order.

Mr. COX. All right; I will make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has already done that, and there is no use of wasting any more time concerning it. The Chair will count to see if there is a quorum present. [After counting:]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Has a Member the right to make a point of order and ask leave to withdraw it?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. COX. That was what I was trying to do a while ago, Mr. Speaker, but the Speaker did not understand it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman want to withdraw it?

Mr. COX. Yes; that is what I wanted to state a while ago.

The SPEAKER. There was so much confusion the Chair could not hear. The Chair wants to state to Members that the rule requires when a gentleman demands a division he shall rise from his seat and demand it, and the same is true as to making a point of order, so as to give the Chair a fair chance to know who the Member is. Some man in the House, not a Member at all, might do it. One day about two weeks ago there was a gentleman sitting here. He was not trying to make a point of order, as he was not a Member of the House. But sitting over here, he remarked to his neighbor, loud enough for the Chair to hear, something as to raising a point of order, and the Chair thought somebody had raised the point of order.

So great is the confusion in the House that the rule ought to be observed. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] was not on his feet and the Chair did not hear him raise the point of order. The Chair supposed the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX], after he had made the point of order and had been recognized, was trying to make it over again.

On this vote the ayes are 115 and the noes are 30. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules are suspended, and the bill is passed.

HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, House bill with Senate amendments of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

H. R. 20193. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to pay a cash reward for suggestions submitted by civilian employees of the Navy Department for improvement or economy in manufacturing processes or plant; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5137. An act for the relief of Alice V. Houghton.

CONTROL OF WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 402 with a committee amendment.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, let the resolution be reported first.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the resolution will be read. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 402) extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes.

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes," approved June 29, 1906, be, and they are hereby, extended and reenacted from March 4, 1913, being the date of the expiration of the operation of said act, to March 4, 1914: Provided, That the first proviso in section 2 of said act limiting the transmission of electrical power from the Dominion of Canada into the United States to 160,000 horsepower be amended by striking out the words "one hundred and sixty thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two hundred and fifty thousand."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] has 20.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my demand for a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland withdraws the demand.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker, I renew the demand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] renews the demand for a second.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] has 20 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this resolution will extend the law that now protects Niagara Falls from the activities of the power companies that desire to take the water which makes the Falls grand and beautiful for the purpose of generating power.

In 1906, owing to the fact that many charters had been granted by the State of New York for the purpose of diverting the water from these Falls to be converted into electric power, Congress passed an act limiting the amount of water that could be taken. That act was to run for three years. In 1909 it was extended for two years more, and in 1911 it was extended to the 4th day of March, 1913; so that if this act is not extended, and no other law is enacted, there will be no law upon the statute books after next Tuesday to protect Niagara Falls from the diversion of any amount of water that these power companies may desire to take, except the treaty that has been entered into between this country and Great Britain.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Ought we not to have a permanent law on that subject and not extend this from year to year?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred this question, has spent much time in dealing with the complicated questions and the engineering problems that are involved in the controversy between those who desire to maintain the scenic beauty and the grandeur of Niagara Falls and the power companies that desire to divert that water for power purposes. That committee has reported a bill to this House—a bill which, we believe, deals in an equitable and just way with every phase of this controversy.

But it is perfectly evident that that bill can not get through this Congress, and therefore it is necessary to extend the existing law for 12 months in order to give the next Congress the first three months of the regular session in which to enact that law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is it not a fact that in the hearings before the committee of which the gentleman is chairman the testimony was to the effect that any further diversion of water would injure the scenic beauty of the Falls?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That undoubtedly is true. The scenic beauty of the Falls has already been injured by the amount of water that has already been taken for power purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would like to ask the gentleman in regard to the question propounded by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND], whether the testimony before the committee had shown that the Falls have been seriously injured. I ask if the preponderance of testimony did not contradict that statement?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. There was testimony there that you could take any quantity of water that these power companies might want and that the Falls would not be injured; but all of the disinterested testimony—the testimony that came from the Army engineers, undisputed by any man in that relation to this question—bore out the statement made by Gen. Bixby, that the scenic beauty of the Falls had already been injured, and that on the Canadian side of the Falls the diversion of 26,000 cubic feet per second has already reduced the flow of water about 9 inches.

I want to say to the House that unless this act is extended there will be no protection for the Falls except the treaty, and the treaty allows a greater diversion of water on this side of the Niagara River than is allowed by the law the operation of which we desire to extend.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Why have you allowed an increase in the amount of horsepower that may be imported?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. For the reason that power companies have been established on the Canadian side, and the power generated there can be brought to the American side for the purpose of being used in industries on this side; but if we do not allow that to be done then these industries will go on the other side of the river.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am not absolutely opposed to this resolution. My only purpose in demanding a second is to call attention to the undignified character of this legislation, and to the further fact that two committees of this House have had before them this Niagara River legislation for the last four years. Now, just before the session adjourns, we are obliged to vote once more on a resolution to extend the so-called Burton Act.

I direct the attention of Members to section 4 of the Burton Act, which they are now asked to extend. It reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States is respectfully requested to open negotiations with the Government of Great Britain for the purpose of effectually providing, by suitable treaty with said Government, for such regulation and control of the waters of Niagara River and its tributaries as will preserve the scenic grandeur of Niagara Falls and of the rapids in said river.

That treaty was actually entered into in 1909, but when we extend the Burton Act we include this provision asking the President to negotiate a treaty which is already in operation and has been for the last five years.

The treaty entered into between the United States and Great Britain provides as follows:

The United States may authorize and permit the diversion within the State of New York of the waters of said river above the Falls of Niagara, for power purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet of water per second.

It will be seen that the treaty provides for the diversion of 4,400 cubic feet more than is allowed under the Burton Act.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] that serious difficulty would occur at Niagara Falls, or that the scenic grandeur would be injured by a further diversion of 4,400 feet, but I will not object to the passage of this resolution. I merely draw the attention of the House to the fact that Congress has been dawdling with this subject for four years, and, if we do not let the Burton Act expire, I can not prophesy when we ever shall get any definite regulation on the subject of this diversion of water from Niagara River.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the committee which reported this bill. Under the circumstances nothing remains to be done except to vote in favor of the extension of the Burton Act.

I was opposed to the increase of the amount which may be imported from Canada from 160,000 to 250,000 horsepower. I should have very greatly preferred a simple extension of the original Burton Act, without any further allowance of an increased amount of importation from Canada. I think it should have been so handled as to prevent that, but an emergency is now before us; and inasmuch as this resolution can not be amended, there is nothing to do but to pass it.

Mr. SMITH of New York. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I regret that instead of considering this resolution we could not have before us the bill which has been reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but, as the chairman of that committee has explained, owing to the lateness of the session, it is impossible to get consideration of it.

Therefore I heartily favor the passage of this resolution. It clearly means that we will have the opportunity to use some of the power which has been generated in Canada, and if we do not use it it will be used in Canada. Managers of factories at Niagara Falls have told me they would have to go into Canada unless they could get this permission. I do not suppose there is a Member of this body that will oppose this, inasmuch as it is for the advancement of the industrial conditions of this country instead of Canada. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP].

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this brief time in which to discuss the features of the measure under discussion because I know that all are impatient to cease their labors at this late hour of the night. I am greatly pleased that there seems to be so little opposition to the passage of the resolution. I think our action will result in time in the enactment of some just measure that will have as its cardinal features provisions which will protect for all time to come the scenic beauties of the greatest natural attraction on the face of the earth.

I hope the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I have the honor to be a member, at the next regular session of Congress will report out a bill in the interest of such conservation of nature's charms, if I may use the expression, and when so reported it will have the same unanimous support that this measure now seems to have.

In drafting the present resolution I had only in mind the purpose of preserving the status quo of the provisions of the law known as the Burton Act; but with much regret, in so far as my own views are concerned, an amendment was adopted by the committee which gives the right to import from Canada a considerable additional amount of power over that as now authorized. This concession was made in deference to the views of those who believe that unless such power is permitted to be used by our own people it is bound in any event to be employed sooner or later on the other side of the line by the right already possessed under existing law. It is only fair to state that this belief alone influenced the committee in conceding any additional importation of power.

The chairman of the committee, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, who has given considerable thought to the subject, has just stated the most important reasons for continuing the present restrictions and regulations as to the diversion of water above Niagara Falls, and he has referred to the Government engineers as well as others who appeared at the many hearings had upon this subject before the committee. It is not my purpose or desire to review in detail any of that evidence at this time. There is, however, another phase involved in this subject upon which I wish to address my remarks, because, after all, it is the one which, in my judgment, most powerfully influences the people not only of our own country but of the entire civilized world. It is that which has to do primarily, if not indeed wholly, with the desire and determination to preserve for all time to come the unrivaled scenic beauty and grandeur of the Niagara Falls.

Before proceeding to that discussion, however, may I be permitted to here quote from the opinion of the highest engineering authority in our Government as to the necessity for prompt action upon the part of Congress. This was called out in answer to a letter which I addressed to the Secretary of War in reference to the provisions of the bill which I had introduced, and is self-explanatory:

OFFICE OF CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
February 21, 1913.

To the SECRETARY OF WAR:

Hon. W. G. SHARP incloses a copy of H. J. Res. 402, Sixty-second Congress, third session, to extend the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes; and he requests an expression of views in the matter, more particularly in regard to the time of extension.

Unless the act in question is extended or replaced by like legislation, the question of control over water diversion and power development at Niagara Falls will be left in a state more or less chaotic. If the act expires by limitation, it is probable that all permits granted thereunder will immediately terminate. At any rate, the War Department will find it difficult, if not impossible, to exercise any control over such permits or over the disposition of any unused or unallotted water power, and no executive will be specifically charged with the duty of supervising the use of water for power development on the American side or the transmission of electrical power from or to Canada.

The proposed time of extension is considered judicious.

It is therefore the view of this office that if other legislation is not to be enacted on the subject, the proposed resolution should be passed.

W. H. BIXBY,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 24, 1913.

Respectfully returned to Hon. W. G. SHARP, House of Representatives, inviting attention to the foregoing report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, in whose views the department concurs.

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

It would seem as though such an opinion should have much weight with the membership of this House in taking prompt and favorable action upon the measure before us. As to what effect even the present rate of diversion of water above the Falls has already had upon their volume and appearance, let me quote from the report of Maj. Charles Keller, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, who was commissioned a few years ago to conduct a most thorough investigation of this subject, in which he says:

The extremely low water of 1895 was due to natural causes, and such a deficiency in precipitation is sure to recur. When this happens, Lake Erie, if still in its natural unrestrained state, will be lowered approximately 2 feet below the summer elevations of 1907 and 1908. Nature will then reduce the height of the sheet flowing over the American Fall by over 3 inches and that over the west end of the Canadian Fall by over 14 inches, while the water at Terrapin Point will be lowered by 5½ inches. These natural changes, added to those produced by existing authorized diversions, will lower the crest at the west end of the Canadian Fall nearly 2 feet and at Terrapin Point over 8 inches. As a result many shallow places at both ends of the Horseshoe Fall will become dry. Thus natural changes, imposed upon those produced by man, will result in a mutilated Niagara, one shorn of nearly half its flow and of much more than one-half its natural beauty, since many places now overflowed will be made bare, the crest line broken, and unity of effect will be seriously disturbed.

The losses due to the operation of natural laws, though largely avoidable, are perhaps bearable; but this is not true of those due to the work of man, and in consequence I am forced to state that existing diversions have already seriously interfered with and injured the scenic grandeur of Niagara Falls at the Horseshoe, and that this injury and interference will probably soon be emphasized by the effects due to the prevalence of lower stages on Lake Erie and the upper Lakes. * * *

The Falls are the common heritage of the entire civilized world. They are held in trust for posterity by the present generation. To injure them further is a proposition whose mere statement brings its own reply. Accordingly, I earnestly recommend that the minimum limits of diversion authorized on the American side, namely, 15,100 cubic feet per second, be reenacted, and that no greater amount of energy be permitted to be imported into the United States from Canada than 160,000 horsepower.

Like evidence could be produced from others who have made a study of the conditions prevailing at Niagara Falls, and the resulting conclusions are certainly not unwarranted. If these authorities are to be believed we are already at the danger point, beyond which we can not safely go if we would have anything like due regard for the preservation of the charms of Niagara.

It is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of any part of the voluminous hearings with reference to the engineering phases of the question; neither will I take time to outline the history of the antecedent legislation upon this subject. For the information of those interested in such matters, I am pleased to refer my colleagues to the most excellent report of Representative CLINE, of Indiana, who in House Report No. 1488 has so ably given the genesis of the entire legislation down to the present time.

Mr. Speaker, may I devote the remainder of my time to considering what many may term the sentimental side of the question, but one which, nevertheless, as I have said, appeals more strongly to the people at large than all other considerations?

A long time ago a poet little known to fame immortalized the sentiment for the preservation of the things that are old in nature's realms with the stanza beginning with the admonition—

Woodman, spare that tree!
Touch not a single bough!
In youth it sheltered me,
And I'll protect it now.

There is a text in these words which not only expresses a sense of deep loyalty but one full of meaning. In this present day of commercialized activity and the craze for constant change, it should be of some value. The tree may have been old and shaky; its wood may have been sought for lumber or fuel; or it may have stood in the way of newer things to be placed there. But what of these reasons? Was it not planted by a family sire? Did it not shelter the writer as a boy, and was it not a mute participant of the joys of his childhood, its recollections more precious than gold? It was more than this. It was a beautiful creation of nature with its spreading limbs, its sturdy trunk, and lofty top. It was a symbol both of strength and the dignity of age.

That old tree called for respect and veneration. But if the stanzas quoted breathe in their every line this noble sentiment, they do still more. In their very words of command to the woodman not to destroy they concede his power to undo in an hour what nature in her mysterious laboratory has taken a century to produce.

Old tree, the storm still brave!
And, woodman, leave the spot;
While I've a hand to save,
Thy axe shall harm it not!

The writer of these noble verses, so full of charming sentiment, was, to my mind, a conservationist in the highest sense.

Was it not in deference to a sentiment quite as strong which prompted this House in the last Congress to overwhelmingly defeat a proposition which involved the establishment of a penal institution within 3 or 4 miles of the gates of Mount Vernon, the last resting place of George Washington—and this even after a very large tract of land had been actually purchased by the Government for that purpose? The speeches of Members on the measure at that time breathed a patriotic feeling that such a desecration ought not to be permitted. And, though more than a century has passed since Mount Vernon had become so tenderly associated with the last days of the Father of his Country, yet his memory still lives, ever green to posterity. Even the remote environment of those sacred grounds was not to be contaminated by the proximity of an institution of that character. Such was the sentiment expressed by those who participated in the discussion of the measure at that time.

If there is anything of sentiment in historical associations, then the scenes amidst which Niagara forms the center are most celebrated. It was here more than 300 years ago—long before either the settlement at Jamestown or the landing of the Pilgrim fathers—that the intrepid French explorers established their gateway to the trackless West and the waters of the Great Lakes. The names of Champlain, La Salle, Marquette, and Father Hennepin are indissolubly linked with the earliest history of those majestic scenes; and whether it was on a mission of conquest of territory in the name of their King, or the more exalted purpose of winning converts among the Indians through the patient work of the Jesuit fathers, this territory formed for many years their most western outposts for supplies and defense. What must have been the awe and wonderment with which these explorers first gazed upon the magnificent spectacle which on all the earth was nature's grandest. Here was the final plunge of mighty waters—great inland oceans of azure blue. The grandeur and sublimity of the cataract formed indeed a fitting climax to the majesty and extent of that great chain of Lakes which were destined to bear upon their bosoms the commerce of an empire.

But the same measure of delight and admiration has ever come to those who for the first time view the grandeur of this unrivaled attraction. No description, however vivid, quite prepares one for the sight; the stupendous scale upon which the whole scene is laid awes the mind. Its fame is world-wide. No visitor from foreign lands would consider that he had seen America without seeing Niagara Falls, our greatest attraction. A million people from every quarter of the globe annually visit the place.

Surely it is inconceivable that the sublime beauty of this priceless gift of nature is to be sacrificed for the purpose of commercializing its power to save mere dollars. And yet for such use alone does the existing treaty allow a possible diminution of approximately one-third of the entire volume of water which undiverted would flow over the Falls. Shall we not say, my colleagues, in behalf not alone of our own constituents but for the people of all nations who love to do homage at nature's shrine and through her charms gather inspiration from the work of the great World Builder Divine, that never by consent of the American Government shall further diversion of these waters be permitted?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the passage of this resolution. I regret very much that the whole controversy could not be decided here. The important question is whether the State of New York or the Federal Government is entitled to jurisdiction over these waters. I claim that the Federal Government has no jurisdiction over it, except for the purposes of navigation and for international defense.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

The SPEAKER. Under the statute the Speaker is required to appoint a temporary Committee on Accounts for the Sixty-third Congress, and the Clerk will read the appointments.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution memorializing Congress in the matter of desert-land entries.

Senate bill 15.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring):

Whereas there is a large body of land lying west of the Missouri River, within the State of South Dakota, subject to entry under the desert-land laws of the United States, whereby the entryman is required by the act of Congress of March 3, 1891, to pay 25 cents per acre at the time of filing and $1 per acre at the time of making final proof, and to expend in labor and material and other improvements the amount of $3 per acre for each acre of his entry; and

Whereas the Department of the Interior has ruled that the entryman upon such desert lands must irrigate all of the irrigable area of said entry with at least 1 acre-foot of water per irrigable acre in each and every year; and

Whereas in the portion of South Dakota subject to desert-land entry the climatic conditions are such as to make compliance with requirements in some years impossible; and

Whereas it has been demonstrated by practical experience that by means of diverting the waters from dry draws during melting snows, floods, or heavy rains, and spreading the same upon lands for irrigation purposes, paying crops have been and can be produced on lands in the western part of South Dakota; and

Whereas it has also been found that storage reservoirs are impracticable and too expensive for the settlers and entrymen as a private enterprise, on account of the great expense incident to the construction of such reservoirs: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to so modify the rules and regulations of the Department of the Interior as to permit entrymen upon desert lands within this State to reclaim said land by irrigation in such years as the precipitation is sufficient through the diversion of flood waters to irrigate such land, and in case the climatic conditions are such that the precipitation or flood waters are sufficient for the purpose of irrigation that the entryman shall be given an extension of not more than 3 years in which to make annual yearly proof and 10 years to make final proof on his entry; and be it further

Resolved, That any person who has made final proof upon a desert-land entry prior to the adoption of this resolution, and has been unable to irrigate the irrigable portion of the lands embraced in such entry on account of insufficient precipitations, that a patent be granted to such entryman where the claimant has complied with the law in all respects, except failure to irrigate the land on account of lack of precipitation; be it further

Resolved, That in all cases, except where fraud is shown, that all moneys paid on entries or final proof shall be refunded to the entryman or claimant where the entry or proof shall be rejected.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I present a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of South Dakota, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. WARREN. If it is proper for me to do so, I will yield for a shorter conference report than the one which I wish to present.

Mr. DU PONT. I ask for the consideration of the conference report on the Military Academy appropriation bill, which was heretofore presented and read.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28699) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4 and 5; that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 6, 8, and 9, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment down to and including the words "Provided further," in line 16, and in lieu thereof insert "$360,000: Provided"; and after the word "President," at the end of the amendment, insert "Provided further, That any cadet, or cadets, reinstated under the provisions of this act shall be additional to those otherwise authorized by law"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "$10,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$5,000"; and after the word "construction," in line 6, insert the words "and completion"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES HAY,
JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think the conference report ought to be presented to the Senate, so that we can understand what it is.

Mr. DU PONT. It is being presented to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; we are about to vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia ask that the conference report be read?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the report be so presented to the Senate that we may understand what it is before the vote is taken on it.

Mr. DU PONT. The report has already been read and ordered printed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has already been read?

Mr. DU PONT. It has already been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JONES. I understood that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] desired to make a statement.

Mr. DU PONT. The Senator withdrew that request.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report is agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I submit the report of the committee of conference on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming submits a conference report, which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 28775) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire that the amendments referred to may be read so that we can understand them.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to their being read, but the Senator will probably not be able to understand the matter much better when they are read. After the reading of the report shall have been concluded, I shall enumerate the subjects which are still in disagreement. I have no objection to the report being read, and of course, I could not object if I desired to do so.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the conference report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire each one of those changes read. I can not tell anything about them by numbers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary is reading everything which the conference report contains.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, simply to give the numbers and go through the report in that way gives no information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The only explanation that could be given would be by the chairman or some other member of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Georgia may not know it, but that is the only shape in which conference reports are made up, on blank forms prepared for that purpose. I have here in my hand a list of items in disagreement, and I shall be glad to explain them when the reading of the conference report shall have been concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, the course to pursue will be, when the reading is concluded, to stop and ask that each one of the numbered amendments be read in full; that privilege which exists and also the privilege of voting on each one of them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, a good many of us on this side of the Chamber are in doubt as to which one of the appropriation bills is being considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill which is now before the Senate, the Chair will say to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the sundry civil bill, as it finally passed, has the amendments contained in this conference report numbered, and, if he has that print of the bill before him it will be easy to follow the reading of the report and to understand what amendments are agreed to, what are disagreed to, and what is their substance.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report of the committee of conference, which is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28775) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire in regard to the provision relating to the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home. Is that an entirely new provision in the bill?

Mr. WARREN. A provision regarding the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home was put on the last sundry civil bill which provided that no vacancies then existing or hereafter occurring should be filled until the total number, which is now ten should be reduced to five. We were able to insist upon a disagreement; and threw it out. It came in again the same way this year, and the best we were able to do was to agree upon a provision that vacancies occurring hereafter should not be filled until the number of the members of the board of managers had been reduced to five. If this provision is adopted, it will then stand that the present vacancies can be filled, but vacancies hereafter occurring can not be filled until the number is reduced to five.

Mr. BURTON. That is, vacancies now existing can be filled?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. But thereafter the number must be reduced to five?

Mr. WARREN. Hereafter, as vacancies occur from time to time, the number must be reduced to five.

Mr. BURTON. Suppose there is a vacancy now?

Mr. WARREN. It can be filled.

Mr. BURTON. There are three ex officio members of that board, are there not, including the President, the Chief Justice, and the Secretary of War?

Mr. WARREN. I am of the opinion that there are two, and probably three, regular members whose terms have expired and whose places have not been regularly filled by appointment and confirmation by the two legislative bodies.

Mr. BURTON. Then, do I understand from the Senator from Wyoming that the vacancies which exist now, as to those members of the board whose terms have expired, can be filled?

Mr. WARREN. I think so.

Mr. BURTON. I do not feel, Mr. President, like standing in the way of the adoption of this conference report because of that provision; but I know that the soldiers in different portions of the country have a very strong feeling on this subject. They wish to have as members of the board those who live in the locality or who will be assigned to the localities in which the various soldiers' homes are situated, so that they may look after their wants and be familiar with the management of the several branch homes. This provision, I presume, is brought in with the idea that there will be more efficiency with a less number, and that five members can perform all the duties that pertain to the homes; but whether or not that can be done I question very much.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I ought to say that these positions on the board of managers have been filled by old soldiers, and, although it is not a happy subject to mention, they are rapidly passing away, and very soon they will all be gone. Even now, there are very few living who are capable of doing the hard work necessary to perform the duties as members of this board. So that, although I was against the provision and resisted it in conference just as far as I could, at the same time there is a reason for eventually reducing the number.

Mr. BURTON. Do I understand from the Senator from Wyoming that this is the exact language of the House provision, or was that modified?

Mr. WARREN. It is a modification. I will ask the Secretary to read the modification of the amendment, it being amendment numbered 40.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows:

"Hereafter vacancies occurring in the membership of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall not be filled until the whole number of members of such board is reduced to five, and thereafter the number of members constituting said board shall not exceed five."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. BURTON. I have no doubt, Mr. President, the Senate conferees performed their duty to the Senate in this matter; but if it were earlier in the session I should certainly object to that provision. I do not feel, however, like opposing the adoption of the conference report at this time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understand that amendments numbered 67 and 68, relating to the Mount Rainier National Park, are still in disagreement?

Mr. WARREN. I was about to state to the Senate, when opportunity permitted, all the amendments that remain unacted upon and their subject matter. I will be brief about it.

Amendment numbered 3 is in regard to the location of the building for the Department of State.

Amendments numbered 8 and 9 refer to the appointment of cadets in Revenue-Cutter Service.

Amendment numbered 16 refers to the dispensaries of the Public Health Service, and more particularly to the diseases of trachoma and pellagra.

Amendment numbered 19 refers to the Columbia Hospital.

Amendments numbered 20 to 25 relate to additional land for the National Zoological Park in Washington.

Amendment numbered 28 relates to the lodge gate at Chickamauga Park.

Amendment numbered 33 to the Crater Lake National Park.

Amendment numbered 47 to the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds.

Amendment numbered 50 to the boundaries of claims in New Mexico.

Amendments numbered 50 to 57 to gauging streams.

I will say that that amendment, put on by the Senate, provides for an additional appropriation.

Amendments numbered 58 and 59 relate to inquiries and investigations by the Bureau of Mines.

Amendment numbered 62 to medical relief in Alaska.

Amendment numbered 63 to the Hot Springs (Ark.) sewerage system.

Amendment numbered 64 to the Glacier National Park.

Amendment numbered 65 and 66 to the Yosemite National Park.

Amendments numbered 67 and 68 to the Mount Rainier National Park.

Amendment numbered 70 to the Crater Lake National Park.

Amendment numbered 71 to the Wind Cave National Park.

Amendment numbered 72 to the Platte National Park.

Amendments numbered 83 and 84 to the Lighthouse Service.

If I may have the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the conferees are in some doubt about completing that until we hear from the Committee on Commerce as to what has been done of late with reference to lighthouses.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am informed that the House has just passed an omnibus bill, including all the lighthouse bills which have been passed separately by the Senate and sent over to the House during the last and the present session. The House has included them, as I have said, in an omnibus bill, which I am expecting every moment to come over to the Senate. I shall then ask that the Senate concur in the action of the House.

Mr. WARREN. May I depend upon the Senator to get it to us just as early as possible, as we must hold some one of these appropriation bills open to cover the matter?

Mr. NELSON. Very well; I am expecting the bill here at any moment.

Mr. WARREN. That bill does not carry an appropriation, does it?

Mr. NELSON. No; it does not.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, to continue my statement:

Amendments numbered 95 and 96 relate to the two fish-cultural stations.

Amendments numbered 100 and 101 to the International Congress or School of Hygiene.

Amendment numbered 102 relates to the international joint commission—an additional appropriation.

Amendment numbered 103 relates to the payment to persons injured in Mexico.

Amendment numbered 129 is in regard to the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

Amendment numbered 130 relates to the National Conservation Exposition.

Mr. President, I will make the motion that the Senate further insist upon these amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives; that we ask the House for a further conference; and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas rise to the question of agreeing to the conference report?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes. Before the report is agreed to, I want to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming what was done with amendment No. 20.

Mr. WARREN. Amendments 20 to 23 are in disagreement. The whole subject is in disagreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate further insist upon its amendments, ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to take up the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. STONE. Has that report been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. CURTIS. It has, and also as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to consider the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the conference report.

The Secretary read the conference report to amendment No. 131.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be not read. It is what is known as the Gallinger public utilities amendment, and has been read half a dozen times in the Senate. The only change is that of the word "section" to "act" or "paragraph."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the reading of the amendment referred to will be dispensed with.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I present the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28766) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings; to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings; to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings; to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings; and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the conference report, and continued the reading to amendment No. 171.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, simply in the interest of time, I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that the report of the conferees, as it is being read, does not give any definite information as to what the various items are when the amendments are simply mentioned by number, and it will all have to be gone over again. The matter is one in which all Senators are more or less interested, and it seems to me it might be well to accompany it with a statement, so that we may have some definite information as to what the report is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the conference report is in the usual form. After it is read I intend to make a statement regarding it, if that will be satisfactory to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator proposes to do it in that way, I have no objection. The statement will have to be made at some time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue the reading of the report.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the conference report, which is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28766) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

GEO. SUTHERLAND,
F. E. WARREN,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN L. BURNETT,
FRANK CLARK,
J. E. ANDRUS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the items upon which the Senate has receded are very few in number. They are all items where the Senate undertook to increase certain House appropriations.

No. 9 is an item making an increase in the case of Milford, Mass., from $15,000 to $18,000. The House item was $15,000 and the Senate increased it to $18,000. The Senate recedes upon that.

No. 63, Shelby, N. C.: The House item was $55,000, the Senate amended it to $60,000, and the Senate recedes.

Front Royal, Va.: The House item was $50,000, the Senate made it $55,000, and the Senate recedes.

Leesburg, Va.: The House item was $55,000, the Senate increased it to $62,000, and the Senate recedes.

Toccoa, Ga.: The House item provided $5,000 for a site, which the Senate increased to $7,500, and the Senate recedes.

Sandersville, Ga.: The House item was $5,000, the Senate increased it to $7,500, and the Senate recedes.

Paintsville, Ky.: The House item was $5,000, the Senate increased it to $7,500, and the Senate recedes.

It is not necessary to refer to the agreements.

With reference to the amendments where any changes are made in the figures, they are all in the direction of decreasing the amount of the appropriation allowed in the particular case. I shall not undertake to take up these various items, unless some Senator is interested and desires to be informed upon some particular matter.

The four items that still remain in dispute are the——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator passes to the four items that are still in disagreement, I wish he would state to the Senate what has been done with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] limiting the application of these funds to cities or towns with a post-office revenue of $10,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That amendment has been modified, so that it now provides that hereafter no building shall be authorized in a town where the post-office receipts are less than $10,000, and no site shall be authorized where the post-office receipts are less than $6,000. It will not apply to this bill, therefore, but will apply to future legislation.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Do I understand that the Senate conferees have agreed, upon the insistence of the House conferees, that the restriction as to postal receipts in any town being at least $10,000 shall be reduced to a minimum figure of $6,000?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is only where a site alone is purchased.

Mr. O'GORMAN. But surely the purchase of a site is to be followed by the erection of a structure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; but the Senator very well knows that in the case of a site the purchase is made, and it may be three or four years before anything else can be done. There are quite a large number of these towns that are growing, and it is the part of economy for the Government to acquire these sites.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Do I understand that the Senate conferees have agreed to that change and modification?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senate conferees have agreed to that change—that sites may be purchased where the postal receipts are in excess of $6,000, but buildings can not be erected until the receipts reach $10,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. If I understand correctly, that does not apply to this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator understands correctly. It does not apply to this bill; it applies to future legislation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I will ask that the Senator repeat his statement as to certain small items in the bill relating to my State—Georgia. I could not exactly catch what he said in that respect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There were two items, one in Toccoa and one in Sandersville, Ga. In the case of Toccoa the House provision was for a site to cost $5,000. The Senate increased it to $7,500. Upon that item the Senate conferees accepted the House provision.

In Sandersville, Ga., exactly the same thing was done. The House provision was for $5,000, and we increased it to $7,500.

With reference to the four items still in disagreement, they are the armory, $1,750,000; the additions to Rock Creek Park, $2,300,000; the Red Cross item, carrying $400,000; and the item for the purchase of a site for a courthouse in New York City, to cost $3,000,000.

Upon those four items, as I say, the conferees are still in disagreement. I can only, perhaps, speculate as to what might happen. It is intimated to us that if we would yield three items the House conferees would be willing to accept the Red Cross item; but thus far they have signified no intention of accepting the other three items. The Senate conferees would probably be willing to yield the armory item and the New York item, and take the Red Cross item and the Rock Creek Park item. That is the situation in which the conference committee concluded its labors.

I move that the report be accepted, and that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments still in disagreement, ask for a further conference thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, first, upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he feels satisfied that he will be able to reach an agreement with the House conferees upon the items that are in dispute?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not know. We can try it again.

Mr. SWANSON. I had an item in the bill in which I was deeply concerned, the Memorial Bridge, which I believe the Senate approved as much as any item in the bill. It was hotly contested here, and by a good majority it was agreed to. But I am unwilling to have the whole bill fail simply in an effort to get some particular item. There are buildings that are in process of construction; there are buildings that are being delayed because of the lack of money to complete them. I want to have a vote of the Senate on each item. Some of these items would not have gone on the bill if the Senate had been satisfied that to put them there meant the jeopardy and perhaps the loss of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to say that if we are going to take up each item and vote upon it, we shall have to take as many votes as there are items in the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. If we can not take a separate vote on all the items of the bill, I move that the Senate recede from the items upon which there is a disagreement.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Utah, whether the conferees have receded in the matter of the amendment to the appropriation for a building at Paintsville, Ky.?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senate receded upon that. There were two items coming together, one for Paintsville and one for Pikeville. Upon the Paintsville item the Senate receded. Upon the Pikeville item the House receded.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I was very hopeful that the eloquent speech of my colleague [Mr. BRADLEY] had convinced every Member of this body of the importance of Paintsville and the propriety of making this appropriation. I am exceedingly anxious that the amount appropriated for Paintsville shall be $7,500, instead of $5,000 as provided by the House item. I wish to ascertain if it is possible at this stage of the proceedings to try again to get the House conference to agree to that item. Has the conference reached the stage where it is impossible to have the appropriation for Paintsville increased to $7,500, or, in other words, to let the Senate amendment stand?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; it is not impossible to do that, but——

Mr. PAYNTER. I hope the Senator will succeed in doing it, because it is very important that it should be done.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It would be possible only if the Senate disagreed to that part of the conference report and sent it back.

Mr. PAYNTER. I do not like to ask that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no other way.

Mr. PAYNTER. I hoped the Senator might be able to accomplish it without sending the report back.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think we are entitled to know what has been done with the various items in the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Utah is trying to explain that.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Utah has just said that he could not reply about Paintsville. Paintsville has interested the Senate more, probably, than any other post office that has been talked about this year, owing to the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, who, I regret, is not in the Chamber at this moment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I make a parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is this: The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] moved to adopt the conference report. Is that amended by the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who moved to recede from the items in dispute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion made by the Senator from Virginia is in order. That is the motion before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that motion ought to prevail. I believe that is the only way a conclusion can be arrived at. I am heartily in favor of the motion made by the Senator from Virginia, that the conferees on the part of the Senate be instructed to recede from the items in difference between the two Houses.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If the motion of the Senator from Virginia should be adopted, what effect would it have upon the motion of the Senator from Utah? I mean would the question then be, Shall the conference report be adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. One more inquiry. In case of a partial report, may there be a vote upon individual items in the report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would rule that that could not be done. The question is upon agreeing to the report.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that there could be no vote upon the individual items?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on that question I have been unable to find that there is any parliamentary rule, though we make a practice of accepting a partial report and sending it back to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The universal practice, so far as the present occupant of the chair is able to state, has been to vote directly upon the acceptance of the report.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware of the practice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course, the report may be rejected and may be sent back to conference.

Mr. LODGE. But the proposition here is that we should agree finally to certain items. When we come to disagree we insist on our amendments, and the disagreement goes to the whole report. When it gets into conference the conferees are not bound on those items that they have agreed on already. They can reopen them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator that that is undoubtedly true. If the conference report is rejected, everything is open, of course.

Mr. SWANSON. My motion was that we accept the conference report of agreements and recede from the items in dispute.

Mr. LODGE. The motion, of course, is to recede.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion.

Mr. LODGE. That motion, of course, is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, is it not the proper procedure to accept the conference report as far as agreed to, and then move to recede on the four amendments in disagreement?

Mr. LODGE. You can not accept part of a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it may be done either way. Part of the report may be first accepted or agreed to, or it may be agreed to after further action is had.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. As to these reports, they go back to conference even though we should vote here approval or disapproval of the different items, unless we propose to recede and accept the House bill. If there is a single item that has not been settled on both sides, the bill must go back to conference. As the Senator from Massachusetts says, until the final report is made and the matter is finally closed it must remain open, because under the rules of the Senate, if you send a report back to conference unaccepted, every item is open in a way; that is, nothing in the bill can be of settled value until the final acceptance of a bill in its entirety by both Houses and the expiration of the time of reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is right on that matter.

Mr. LODGE. That is my understanding.

Mr. BACON. I do not know that I correctly understood the Senator from Wyoming when he made the proposition to which I understood the Chair to assent, but my understanding of his proposition was that even if the Senate agreed to a partial report the whole report would still be open for the consideration of the conferees. That would be true if the House did not also agree to it; but if the House agrees to a partial report to which the Senate has agreed, the conferees are concluded as to those items.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a moment. The Senator from Massachusetts signifies his dissent. What is the purpose of the agreement here? It amounts to nothing if it be true that after the Senate and House have agreed to a report containing 40 items upon which the conferees have recommended an agreement, thereafter the conferees may still reopen it and proceed to try the question and give assent, or rejection, or modification to it.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator refers to my statement, under our rules, finally, to close a conference report it has to be voted upon as a whole. These other agreements are in the way of a direction to the conferees. If the Senate should adopt the motion of the Senator from Virginia it is of no avail whatever except to give the opinion of the Senate when there comes a time that the Senate disagrees and the House disagrees, and it is moved to adhere, and so forth, and it is a question of the bill failing or passing. But they are all directional until, under the rule, we finally accept the whole report. We settle, so far as the approval of the Senate and the House is concerned, the work as far as they have gone; and then comes the final question, Shall we accept or reject the conference report, as the rule provides?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I did not yield the floor, but I will yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me further——

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Wyoming interrupted me, but with my consent. I will also yield to the Senator from New York. I have not finished.

Mr. WARREN. The idea being that legislation can not be piecemeal, but that there must be a finality to it.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from Wyoming has touched upon the idea that I rose to express—that the only way in which it is possible for the two Houses to agree is by an act of legislation. There can be no effective agreement except where they agree in a law, and although either House may express a readiness to incorporate a specific item in a law, that does not and can not be a final and effective agreement. Until the agreement is upon a law, every part of the law must still remain open for action by whatever House has possession of the bill.

So when we pass a resolution which expresses agreement on a particular item in a law, it can be nothing but an expression of opinion. We can not, say, by a resolution regarding that partial report of the committee enact a bill which leaves unsettled one of the elements forming an essential part of the bill; and we can not by a resolution do that which is equivalent to a reconsideration of the action already taken by this House upon a part of the bill.

The only effect which any resolution could have must necessarily be by way of an expression of willingness to do something in the future. The conferees, if the matter is sent back to conference, of course, will do the best they can for the amendments that have passed their own House, keeping in mind that expression of willingness.

And, Mr. President, that expression does not have the effect of reconsidering the provision to which it relates. It does not nullify or repeal the formal action of the Senate in adopting an amendment. It can do nothing else than signify the willingness of the Senate, for the sake of an agreement upon a complete law, to yield a position. It does not reverse the action of the Senate upon the provision.

Now, sir, if this bill goes back to conference the conferees must necessarily have free scope to make such arrangement with the managers of the House as in their judgment will best conform to the views and the sense of duty of the body which they represent. When their report comes back incorporating what they propose under their sense of obligation in the performance of their duty, the Senate will have open to them necessarily a full scope in dealing with their report and in acting upon it one way or another, adopting it in whole or in part; and when it finally comes we must either accept or reject the whole. We can not by this process of acting upon the report of the conferees divide and subdivide legislation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the point of difference between the learned Senator and myself, as I understand it, is this: The Senator assumes that my contention is that when the House and the Senate have agreed upon a partial report that enacts as law that which has thus been agreed upon. I make no such contention as that. I am speaking of what is the function and office and jurisdiction of the conferees. When the Senate and the House act upon the same bill and agree upon 10 sections of it and disagree upon the eleventh section of it, that does not enact the 10 sections into law, but when that bill is sent to the conference it does limit the function of the conferees to a consideration of the eleventh section.

In the same way, Mr. President, when a bill has been sent to conference upon certain enumerated and specified differences, and the Senate and House conferees agree upon a recommendation to the Senate and House that there shall no longer be a disagreement upon certain of those differences, but fail to make a similar recommendation as to other differences, and upon that partial report the Senate makes an agreement and the House makes an agreement, and they come together, that eliminates that matter from the further consideration of the conferees in the same way as if the House and Senate had never differed as to those particular items.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon the Chair for a moment, the Chair will state that he meant to rule precisely along that line.

Mr. BACON. I do not think there can be any possible doubt about the correctness of that rule. Otherwise, for us to agree to a partial report specifying certain items upon which there was an agreement would be a piece of utter uselessness. The purpose is to remove from conference certain matters upon which there had been differences and leave for the conference still to consider and act upon the matter upon which there has been no agreement.

Mr. President, it seems to me that is too plain for any possibility of doubt as to the correct construction, and I was quite sure that that was in the mind of the Chair when he assented to the proposition of the Senator from Wyoming.

I understood the Chair to assent to the proposition of the Senator from Wyoming, and it was in reference to that that I desired to direct the attention of the Chair.

The proposition further is that, of course, there must ultimately be a final agreement subsequent to the matters which the House and the Senate have thus come to an agreement upon, either in the original passage of the bill separately by each House or by their subsequent agreement to different items in pursuance of the recommendation of a conference—there must be a final agreement and a final report adopting it all, and so long as there is a single item unagreed to it is not enacted into law. But when we once agree with the House and say that certain matters of difference shall be eliminated that ends the function of the conference as to that particular matter. I do not think there can be any possible question about that. It stands to reason and it is in accordance with precedents.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not so much interested in the abstract question which is discussed as I am in the immediate situation. The Senator from Utah has moved to adopt the conference report. The Senator from Virginia has moved to recede from the points of disagreement. If we adopt both these motions, the participation of the Senate in this bill at least will have come to an end, because we will have agreed to the House provision or to the Senate suggestion as to the points of agreement and we will have receded from the points of disagreement.

For that reason, Mr. President, I think that the motion of the Senator from Virginia is not in order at this time. We ought, as it seems to me, first to dispose of the motion of the Senator from Utah and ascertain whether we intend to retain these matters in disagreement or whether we intend to recede from the recommendation of the conferees on the part of the Senate. I think the motion of the Senator from Utah ought to be first disposed of before we consider the other motion.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to read to the Chair and to the Senate what Senator Blaine, while presiding, said upon a similar question. Mr. Blaine said:

> The only usage that I have ever known which justifies a partial report of this kind is where it gives the one body or the other a ground for receding if it chooses. If its judgment is that the only point of disagreement left is not worth insisting upon, it recedes; but if it is worth insisting on, it simply asks another conference.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I think possibly the better course, and it is also the usual course, is to have the motion made by the Senator from Utah that we agree to the conference report first submitted, and then, after that is adopted, I will make a motion to recede from the disagreement of the Senate to those amendments.

Mr. LODGE. The motion of the Senator from Utah is that the Senate shall insist on its disagreement.

Mr. SWANSON. I propose a substitute for that. I propose to amend it by moving that we recede, which has precedence. If the Senator enters a motion to insist, I shall offer as a substitute that we recede, which has precedence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the question ought properly to be taken first on agreeing to the report which has been submitted.

Mr. LODGE. One moment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to be heard on the question?

Mr. LODGE. Yes, Mr. President; I desire to be heard on this whole matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. It is a very interesting question of parliamentary law to begin with. As to the situation here, I have the sole precedent about partial reports in my hand, and I should like to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would be pleased to hear the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I think that at this late date in the session we might as well be frank. It will only tend to expedite business. There are appropriation bills waiting here. There are two or three Senators at least who stated strongly the other day their views about this public buildings bill. For the first time in all my service here I said that if certain things were done the bill would not pass. I never made such a statement before, and I hope never to make such a statement again.

But this bill has many grave defects. I think there are many appropriations in it that are not defensible. I am not complaining in the least of what was done for my own State; I should be glad to have the appropriations for my own State, but I think the bill in many items is very indefensible.

It was greatly modified and approved by the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. I think that was a very wise provision. That has been whittled away so that it is now only a partial protection.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. KERN. I inquire of the Senator if the provision in the conference report is any protection at all? Could this Congress bind any future Congress as to a limitation of appropriations? It might as well have wiped it all out.

Mr. LODGE. I dare say if that is the case, it only makes it worse. I understood that they had cut it down in such a way that it was of very little further consequence.

Mr. KERN. The cutting down that is provided for takes effect only at some other time in the future. It does not apply to existing conditions at all.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, I see.

Mr. KERN. It is simply an attempt to fool the people a little more.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I rose to state my understanding of the agreement with regard to the amendment introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. It is, in effect, that that agreement, which was in order because it was a limitation upon the appropriations of this bill, has been rejected. So there is no longer any limit upon these appropriations of the character proposed by the Senator from Indiana. But as a means of softening, by cuttle-fish operation, the harsh lines of that rejection it is proposed to put into the bill a provision regarding future appropriation bills, a provision that will have no more binding force and effect when those bills come before future Congresses than the expression of opinion in an editorial in a morning newspaper.

That is the whole of the treatment of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, as I understand it. What is proposed now is that we shall abandon the limitation which establishes some relation between the cost of the public buildings and sites and the amount of business done in post offices, on the one hand, and abandon all the items put into the bill by the Senate in which the public is interested, and the public only is interested, on the other hand, and leave nothing but private interests in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I want only a moment to say that the greater part of the remarks of the Senator from New York are such as I can agree with; but, as to this limitation, the only difference is that if the limitation goes into this bill as to the particular appropriations proposed, if the bill passes, which is very doubtful, it would hold as to two or three dozen possible projects—mostly sites only—and the next time it would come up just the same. If it is placed in the bill now as legislation, it would require only a repeal hereafter. If the bill passes—which, as I said before, is very doubtful—with the proposed limit eliminated, it would amount to the purchase of 20 or 30 sites and small buildings only.

I am not taking ground either way, but that is the real difference. If the Senator from New York or any other Senator thinks that if we should put that provision in this bill it would have any effect whatever on those bills which come hereafter, he is mistaken. This same bill, with millions and millions more added, without such a restriction, will come up next year and will pass.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this shows the importance of considering in a bill an item of amendment so serious as this one in the amount which it takes from the Treasury. It had not occurred to me that its whole force had been destroyed by making it applicable to the future. This is the form in which it comes back from conference. This is what we are asked to agree to:

That hereafter——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. LODGE. I am reading from the conference report which I have in my hand.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the Senator favors agreeing to that amendment and insisting on the disagreement to the other items.

Mr. LODGE. Never; I never knew what it was until this minute.

Mr. SWANSON. Is the Senator willing to vote for the proposition to agree to the report and insist on the amendments still in disagreement?

Mr. LODGE. I want to insist on a disagreement to the report and send it back to conference.

Mr. SWANSON. Are you willing to confirm the report as made?

Mr. LODGE. As far as it has gone?

Mr. SWANSON. As far as it has gone.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not with this amendment treated as it is.

Mr. SWANSON. Not with this amendment?

Mr. LODGE. No; this amendment as it is now reads:

That hereafter no authorization shall be made for the construction of a building to be used exclusively for post-office purposes at any town or city where the postal receipts have not reached the sum of $10,000 annually, nor shall any authorization for the purchase of a site for post-office purposes only be made at any town or city where the postal receipts have not reached the sum of $6,000 annually.

The last part, as I recall, lowers the limit, even for the future, but of course it takes away the whole purpose of the amendment, as I understood it, as offered by the Senator from Indiana, which was to cut out certain appropriations in this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; gladly.

Mr. BORAH. If the amendment of the Senator from Indiana should prevail, how much would it cut out of the bill altogether?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. LODGE. It would cut out more than that, I know.

Mr. KERN. It cuts out, as I understand, about 90 of the buildings and sites.

Mr. BORAH. How much altogether, in dollars and cents, would be cut out?

Mr. KERN. I do not know.

Mr. LODGE. As this debate proceeds we will examine and find out precisely what it does cut out.

Mr. BORAH. And as it proceeds we will find out that it cuts out an amount so small that it does not amount to anything at all.

Mr. LODGE. That, of course, is to be determined by an examination of the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. SWANSON. The amendment, as stated by the Senator from Wyoming, fixes up a future policy for the Government in accordance with the wishes of the Senator from Indiana, and when amendments come in in the future, if they are not estimated for by a department and in pursuance of the general law, they would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. No; not on this bill. This bill requires no estimate.

Mr. SWANSON. But there is a rule which requires that any amendment not in pursuance of existing law or not estimated for by a department is subject to a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. That applies only to general appropriation bills. This is not a general appropriation. No point of order lies against it.

Mr. SWANSON. I am satisfied it would fix the policy for the future; that no building and no site that did not measure up to it would be considered in the future; and it is wise legislation.

Mr. BACON. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator. Suppose the item were in the original bill and not an amendment, the general law would control in that regard; it would not be open to a point of order. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, but I am answering the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia. An amendment might be subject to a point of order because it would be subject to those limitations which are put upon amendments, but if the original bill passed in the House should contain the item, certainly a point of order would not lie against it.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. I rise to ask for the reading of the rule to which the Senator from Virginia has referred. I do not like to have the matter rest in uncertainty as to the effect upon any future legislation of the treatment that has been given to the limitation clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will venture to suggest that it is not necessary to read the rule. A public buildings bill is not an appropriation bill under our rule, and hence the provisions relating to appropriation bills do not apply.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move to substitute in place of this pending matter the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report upon House bill 28283, the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

The conference report was read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 4, 12, 34, 38, 39, 45, 64, 66, 69, 73, 75, 76, 77, 80, 81, 88, 101, 104, 107, 108, 113, 114, 115, 116, 120, 121, 128, 129, 130, 135, 140, 141, 157, 158, 159, 160, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 181, 182, 189, 190, 193, 194, 200, 205, 208, 211, 213, 215, 216, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 226, 227, 228, 229, 237, 240, 243, 244, 245, 246.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, it is quite impossible to appreciate the effect of the various concessions which are reported without having the terms of the amendments before the Senate. I am aware that this conference report is in the usual form, and I make no criticism whatever upon the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate, but we should be passing upon this conference report without any real understanding of what it is if we were to vote now upon it without having the amendments presented to the Senate; and I ask that the amendments be read, to which this report refers, by numbers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Senator from New York requests that the amendments referred to in the conference report be read separately. The Secretary will state the first amendment. [A pause.] The Chair will say to the Senator from New York that the amendments themselves are not at the desk, but only the conference report is here. Word has been sent to the Secretary's office to have the amendments sent to the desk.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the amendments that are disposed of simply by number are all in the print of the bill as printed in the House after the bill left the Senate. The amendments which are agreed to and those which have been agreed to with amendments are all contained in that copy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was stating what the Secretary had informed the Chair. The Chair will suggest that the conference report has been read in full.

Mr. LODGE. I know that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment to the Senate in full.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; but simply to save time I suggested that we take the House print of the agricultural appropriation bill and have the amendments read as numbered there, which are either accepted or refused, without further action. I repeat they are all in the House print of the bill as it passed the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the House print is not at the desk. It will have to be sent for.

Mr. LODGE. It can easily be procured.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] what is the purport of his request—that the amendments as amended or rejected or adopted by the conference committee be read in full and whatever changes have been made shall be read as well?

Mr. ROOT. Precisely, Mr. President, so that we may know what we are acting on.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Is it the Senator's desire to merely have those amendments read which are affected by the conference report?

Mr. ROOT. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, while the Senate is waiting for the amendments to be sent to the desk I should like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and I desire to ask him what was done with a certain provision on page 54 of the Senate print of the bill?

Mr. BURNHAM. Let me inquire of the Senator the number of the amendment?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know what the number is, so I shall have to read the provision. The committee inserted, beginning with line 23 of the Senate bill, on page 54, the following provision:

For the establishment of a national game preserve, to be known as the North Dakota National Game Preserve, upon the land embraced within the boundaries of the Sullys Hill National Park in the State of North Dakota, to be used as a permanent national range for elk, deer, and such other game animals and birds as may be placed therein, $10,000, to be available until expended, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to inclose the said game preserve with a good and substantial fence, to construct thereon all necessary sheds, buildings, and corrals for the proper care and maintenance of the animals, to erect a suitable headquarters, to construct and maintain roads, trails, and other structures necessary for the convenience of visitors, and to incur such other expenses as may be necessary for the proper maintenance of the preserve and the animals placed therein.

Mr. President, that provision was inserted at my request and with the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture. There could be no possible objection to this item, so far as it would go toward establishing a new precedent, because we have now four or five of such game preserves. We have one in the State of Montana, another in the State of South Dakota, another in the State of Oklahoma, another in the State of Wyoming, and I believe there is a fifth one in the State of Nebraska. I am at a loss to understand why an item so infinitesimal, only involving an expenditure of about $10,000, should be stricken from the bill, when the Secretary of Agriculture, under whose control this matter would go, so strongly recommends that this game preserve should be established and that this appropriation should be made.

The land proposed to be taken is now owned by the Government as a national park. It is peculiarly fitted and most suitable for a game preserve, a place where game animals could be kept. I only want to take up the time of the Senate by having the Secretary read a letter from Secretary Wilson on this very provision. I have marked the portions in the copy of the hearings which I desire to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

FEBRUARY 1, 1913.

Hon. HENRY E. BURNHAM,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture and Forestry,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the Senate amendment to the Agriculture appropriation bill (H. R. 28283), proposed by Senator GRONNA for the establishment of a national game preserve in North Dakota, on which you request a report.

This amendment proposes to appropriate $10,000 for the erection of fences, headquarters, and other buildings, and the construction of roads and trails necessary for the establishment and maintenance of the North Dakota national game preserve on the land in Sullys Hill National Park, N. Dak.

I inclose herewith a map showing the boundaries of this park. From information on file in the Biological Survey it appears that Sullys Hill Park, on the south shore of Devils Lake, N. Dak., was established in 1904, and has an area of about 780 acres. The land is partially wooded, well watered, and contains some excellent grazing ground. The highest point on the reservation, and the one from which it takes its name, Sullys Hill, attains an elevation of about 1,000 feet above the lake. Apparently no appropriation has ever been made for this reservation or any effort put forth to develop the park for any purpose. If inclosed with a suitable fence it would provide an excellent location for big game of various species characteristic of North Dakota and the northern plains region, such as buffalo, elk, mule and white-tailed deer, and antelope. The reservation is ample for a herd of moderate size and affords abundant grass and water. The amount proposed is sufficient to construct the fence and necessary buildings. If the appropriation is made at this time the department is prepared to place on the reservation a herd of elk and can doubtless provide a few deer, so that no part of this sum need be expended for the purchase of animals. Once established, the preserve can be maintained at very moderate expense.

I especially call the attention of the committee to the fact that experience in the Yellowstone Park and the Wichita Game Preserve shows the importance of having herds of buffalo and other big game located at several widely separated points in order to prevent the spread among them of contagious diseases which may break out from time to time. The department has already under its jurisdiction small herds of buffalo and elk on the Wichita Game Preserve in Oklahoma, the National Bison Range in Montana, and the Niobrara Preserve in Nebraska. Congress has recently authorized the establishment of a preserve in the Wind Cave Park in South Dakota. The North Dakota game preserve is smaller than any of the others and can be established and maintained at less cost. If Sullys Hill Park can be used for this purpose it will afford an opportunity of establishing a herd of big game, which can be utilized as a center of distribution for stocking other parks. It will also be a refuge for birds, including two species of grouse native to the region, will provide for the utilization of a reservation hitherto undeveloped, and will afford a park which will be a point of attraction for visitors from North Dakota and other States. The project has my approval, as it is entirely feasible, economical, and is desirable from every point of view.

Respectfully, JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I understand the Secretary has only read the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture on page 60.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is what the Secretary read.

Mr. GRONNA. I should like also to have a part of the hearings down at the bottom of the other page read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Secretary has read that. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the separate amendments whenever it will suit the convenience of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I should like to have the matter I desire to present to the Senate all go in together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well. The Secretary will read the matter referred to by the Senator.

The Secretary read as follows:

Senator GRONNA. This land on which we would like to have this reserve established is now a national park.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand so.

Senator GRONNA. It is now under the control of the Interior Department, and what we want to do by this amendment is simply to make it a game preserve and put it under the control of the Secretary of Agriculture. If you will pardon a little diversion, I will say that right across from this park we hold our chautauquas of the State; it is just across the lake, and of course we are very anxious to have it. It would be a very good thing, not only for our State but for several neighboring States. We could have elk, deer, and have a place for birds, where they would not be disturbed.

Secretary WILSON. We approve of that in our letter to Mr. BURNHAM.

Senator GRONNA. I am glad of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The expense of fencing would be substantially that amount, Senator? I see you have $10,000.

Senator GRONNA. I have a statement here prepared for me.

MEMORANDUM BY MR. GRONNA.

Sullys Hill National Park was created by act of Congress April 27, 1904 (33 Stat., 323). It comprises 680 acres on the south of Devils Lake, part of which is well wooded. The tract was established largely on account of its historic association, but thus far Congress has appropriated little or nothing for its maintenance or development. If inclosed with a suitable fence, it will be admirably adapted for a game preserve and will become a point of attraction for visitors from all parts of the State and from other States. The number of visitors is now about 200 a year, but this number would be largely increased if there were any provision for their accommodation or for the proper development of the present attractive features of the park.

During the past 10 years Congress has appropriated for several similar projects in several other States, as follows:

1906. For the Wichita Game Preserve in Oklahoma.
1908–10. For the Montana National Bison Range.
1912. For an elk refuge in Wyoming.
1912. For the Wind Cave National Game Preserve in South Dakota.

Provision has also been made for a game preserve on the Niobrara Reservation in Nebraska.

Thus in recent years Congress has provided liberally for the establishment of similar projects in five Western States, while North Dakota, with a suitable park already within its boundaries, has received no appropriation for the development of this park during the nine years of its existence.

The appropriation necessary for the proper development of the preserve is approximately as follows:

For inclosing the preserve with a suitable woven-wire fence	$5,000
For erecting a building for headquarters	1,500
For constructing roads, trails, etc	1,500
For incidental expenses, including purchase of miscellaneous supplies, feed, payment of transportation for game, and salary of warden	2,000
	10,000

Of course that is a very small amount, but I did not feel like asking for a great deal. I would be glad to have a little more. I had letters from the Commercial Club of Devils Lake, in which they told me the amount was not sufficient. They told me I should have asked for $15,000, anyway.

Secretary WILSON. I think what you have asked for would make a very good beginning. It takes some time to build those fences.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have asked to have these extracts read for the purpose of showing that there are now 5 or 6 game preserves in the United States for which we appropriate money in this bill. The people of my State wish to have this land, which is now a national park, set aside as a game preserve; and so long as that is the desire of and is satisfactory to the people of the State, it seems to me that Congress should not object. If it were a new matter for which there were no precedent at all, I should not take up the time of the Senate even to ask the chairman of the committee why this provision was stricken out; but it seems to me that I am at least entitled to an explanation from the chairman of the committee, and I ask him now why this small appropriation for this desirable purpose was stricken from the bill by the committee of conference. It was passed by the Agricultural Committee unanimously, and was passed by this body unanimously, and I ask the chairman to explain why it was taken out of the bill.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I wish to say, in explanation, that this amendment which was adopted, as has been stated, by the committee and by the Senate, was one of the last amendments from which the Senate conferees receded. For something like 24 hours this and other amendments were held in dispute. I should like to say to the Senator that every effort was made to retain this particular amendment, because it was a Senate amendment, and because it had, I think, the support of the Senate conferees individually; but we found it to be the fact that the House conferees were very determinedly opposed to the amendment; they were, in fact, opposed to game preserves in general; they believed that it was the beginning of a continuous expense to the Government, and stated that they did not approve of the policy. While there was no particular objection to this one game preserve, they regarded the fact to be that it was time to stop that business. That was the position which the House conferees took.

That was contrary to the view of the conferees on the part of the Senate. Not only were all the arguments which have been presented here by the Senator from North Dakota, together with the statement from the hearings, presented to the conferees, but we had the benefit of the presence of the Senator himself, who went over this whole matter and argued it before the House conferees. Yet, notwithstanding all that, notwithstanding every effort to retain this particular amendment to the last, we were unable to do so; and it did not seem to your committee that they would be justified in holding back a conference report upon such an important bill as this because of a single provision, such as the one to which the Senator from North Dakota has referred, however much we might have been interested in it, and notwithstanding our desire to have it retained in the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I was just about to say that I am sure the chairman of the committee has done all that anyone could do to retain this particular item. I find no fault with the action of the members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate; and I shall not try to delay the passage of the bill simply because I do not get what I am justly entitled to and what was unanimously inserted in the bill.

I fully appreciate the value of time at this particular moment. We only have a few hours left until this Congress shall be at an end. For that reason I shall let it go at this time, in the hope that during the next Congress those who will then be members of the conference committee to which this matter may be referred will take the time to look into it and see that it is not establishing a new precedent, and also do justice to this particular locality the same as they have done in five other instances in this particular bill.

The SECRETARY. Amendment numbered 1 to the bill is——

Mr. JONES. The Senator who asked for the reading of the amendments is not present, and I suggest that it be dispensed with. We can very easily follow the amendments by looking at the report.

Mr. FALL. I ask that the amendments be read.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 28766, the public buildings bill.

Mr. BURNHAM. May I ask the Senator from Utah if he thinks it will take much time?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think we can dispose of it in a very few minutes. I will ask to have the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill laid aside temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the conference report under consideration on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the agricultural appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 28766.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senate to agree to the report.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Lodge	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	du Pont	McLean	Smoot
Borah	Fall	Martin, Va.	Stephenson
Bourne	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Stone
Brady	Gallinger	Myers	Sutherland
Brandegee	Gamble	Nelson	Swanson
Bristow	Gardner	Newlands	Thomas
Burnham	Gronna	Oliver	Thornton
Burton	Guggenheim	Overman	Tillman
Catron	Jackson	Page	Warren
Chilton	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Watson
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Pittman	Webb
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Pomerene	Wetmore
Crane	Kern	Richardson	Williams
Crawford	La Follette	Root
Culberson	Lea	Sheppard
Cummins	Lippitt	Smith, Md.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll, 65 Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senate to agree to the report of the conference committee, and I will move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments still in disagreement, and ask for a further conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I wish to say in this connection that I made a motion to recede from the disagreement of the Senate to certain items in the bill, but I am satisfied from the debate which would be precipitated and the delay that would be occasioned by the consideration of those amendments that the chances of the passage of the bill would be enhanced by sending it back to conference. I am assured that the conferees will make another report of some kind before the adjournment of the present Congress.

Mr. LODGE. I want it understood, of course, that the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is still in conference. I do not agree to that change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia withdraws his motion?

Mr. SWANSON. My motion has been withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is withdrawn. The Senator from Utah moves that the report be agreed to, and that the Senate further insist on the amendments in controversy and ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. If that carries an agreement to the change in the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], I do not want to have that done. Under the only precedent we have an agreement was made to each item. I think we can properly disagree on that item and agree on the rest, leaving that in conference with the other items still in disagreement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will modify my motion accordingly and move that the Senate further insist on its amendments reported as being in disagreement, and, in addition, upon the amendment with reference to the limitation upon the authorization for the erection of buildings and purchase of sites.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Utah put his motion in writing?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to inquire as to the disposition of amendment 262, regarding a commission to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, the Attorney General, two Members of the Senate, and two Members of the House, who shall, with the aid of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, the Commission of Arts, and a member of the Engineer Corps of the Army to be appointed by the President, with a view to presenting a connected scheme for public buildings involving standards, adaptability, and so forth. I ask the Senator what changes have been made in that amendment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The amendment has been amended by the conferees so as to provide that two members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and two members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House shall be appointed, striking out the provision with reference to the Commission of Arts and a member of the Engineer Corps of the Army to be appointed by the President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the provision with reference to the aid of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury remain?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That remains.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me suggest to the Senator that there is some question as to whether the Commission of Arts under the law authorizing it has the power to study questions outside of the District of Columbia. The reason why I inserted that clause in the amendment was in order to give the commission the opportunity of securing the aid of that commission. So far as the Engineer Corps of the Army is concerned, we all know that there are several very distinguished Army engineers who have been intrusted with great public works and public buildings, and that one of those men would be of great service in aiding this commission. Was there any special reason why the Commission of Arts and the Engineer Corps of the Army should not be availed of?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It was thought that as that commission consists of a number of persons it might be difficult to get them together. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that I will modify my motion once more so that the bill can go back to conference.

I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments, ask for a further conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me call the attention of the chairman to the importance of securing full cooperation of the Commission of Arts and the Engineer Corps of the Army. The Commission of Arts, as the Senator knows, is composed of leading artists and architects in the country. Among the architects are some of the greatest constructors in the country, men of very large administrative capacity, for instance, Mr. Cass Gilbert.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Nevada allow the Chair to state the question? The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Utah that if the report is rejected it goes back without the necessity of appointing conferees; that it goes back automatically and has the same standing it had before the report was made.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It does not seem to me, then, that the bill would automatically go to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question in this form: That the Senate disagree to the report, further insist upon its amendments, and ask for a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. CULBERSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Utah, if I may have his attention, to the importance of having the Commission of Arts collaborate in this work. I was referring to Mr. Cass Gilbert, who is the architect of some of the greatest public structures in the country, and is consulted not only with reference to great public buildings but with reference to great public works. He is consulted by the large railway systems regarding their traffic arrangements in great cities, and so forth, and his experience and observation will be of the greatest value in a work of this kind. There are other members of the commission who have had large experience in architecture and construction whose aid would be most valuable.

Then there is Mr. Frederick Law Olmsted on that commission, who is a landscape architect and who has been engaged in civic planning, and has recently undertaken the great work of reforming plans of the city of Pittsburgh. It seems to me that his advice and cooperation would be of the greatest importance. I am aware of the fact that the commission can, if it chooses, consult this commission.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, what is before the Senate?

ADJOURNMENT OF LEGISLATIVE DAY.

Mr. LODGE (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., Monday, March 3). The Senate is still in the legislative day of Saturday. It is necessary that we should take an adjournment in order that we have a new legislative day. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at 20 minutes before 3 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. FALL. Mr. President, simply a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FALL. Is the conference report on the Agriculture appropriation bill the unfinished business coming over until today? This is a new legislative day, I understand.

It shall be the duty of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics to collect, through the said Division of Markets, by any expeditious method, as by telegraph, telephone, mail, or otherwise, compile, and report to farmers, farmers' organizations, and societies of consumers daily bulletins or telegraphic reports of such information and statistics as will enable them to adopt plans of marketing that may facilitate the handling of farm products at a minimum cost: Provided, That when such reports or statistics are requested to be furnished by telegraph or telephone, or methods other than the United States mail, the person or association making such request must advance the fee for the cost of transmission, which shall be deposited to the appropriation for the maintenance of the said Division of Markets. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to make an annual report to Congress regarding the work of the said Division of Markets, with any recommendations that may enable Congress to enact any additional necessary legislation.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall make all necessary arrangements for offices and supplies for the use of said Division of Markets, including office equipment, rent in or out of the District of Columbia, stationery, telegraphing, and all other necessary expenses. The compensation of clerks and employees not otherwise specifically provided for in this act shall be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture subject to the restrictions of existing law.

Amendment numbered 248 is on page 84, line 10, where it is proposed to strike out "$17,593,275" and insert "$18,553,202."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the reading of the amendments. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if the amendment with reference to the distribution of free seeds was taken out in conference?

Mr. BURNHAM. I wish to make a very brief reply to that, and it is simply this: We found that it was impossible to retain the free-seeds amendment inserted by the Senate and pass the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Then, is it fair to say that the House conferees insisted on striking out the amendment?

Mr. BURNHAM. They insisted upon it; and from information we had from them, which was just as positive as anything could be, and from information outside, we became fully satisfied that the bill could not be passed with that provision in it.

Mr. KENYON. I was anxious to have the RECORD show the economy practiced by the House in insisting in keeping in the bill a wasteful, foolish, nonsensical provision requiring the expenditure of public funds. I am not going to proceed to jeopardize in any way the passage of the bill. I simply want to say that it may act as a notice that next year I am going to make that fight even to the extent of defeating the bill, if it be necessary. I regard it as a foolish and wasteful expenditure of money; and I am glad the RECORD now shows that the party in control at the other end of the Capitol, the party which is coming into power and talking economy, are insisting that the provision shall remain in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask for the adoption of the conference report on House bill 26874, the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will yield a moment, I wish to make a statement in regard to the amendment for the direct election of United States Senators. I think it is well to put in the RECORD the status of the proposed constitutional amendment so far as the various State legislatures are concerned.

The State of Alabama has taken no action, the legislature of that State not being in session.

The State of Arizona ratified the amendment June 3, 1912.

The States of Arkansas, California, and Colorado have ratified it.

The State of Connecticut has failed to ratify it, although the legislature is now in session. So far as I have been able to learn, it has not been taken up in either branch of the legislature of that State.

In Delaware the resolution ratifying the amendment has passed the house, but has failed to pass the senate. It is now pending, I am advised, before the senate committee.

The State of Florida has not ratified it. I am advised that the legislature has not yet assembled, but will assemble early this summer.

Mr. FLETCHER. In April.

Mr. BRISTOW. It will meet in April, and the Senators from that State advise me that the sentiment there is strongly in favor of its ratification.

The State of Georgia has not ratified the amendment, and the legislature, when it was in session last year, passed an unfriendly resolution. This is one of the two States that have shown some hostility to the amendment. The legislature, I understand, meets again this summer, and I hope it may change its attitude. The State of Idaho has ratified the amendment; so has Illinois. I have been informed by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] that the State of Indiana has ratified the amendment, but the information I had received from other sources is to the effect that it has not been ratified. If either of the Senators from Indiana is in the Chamber, I should like to inquire as to the fact. [A pause.] I see neither of them here. Probably one of the Senators from that State will appear before I am through.

I see that the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has entered the Chamber. I was presenting to the Senate the situation as to the ratification of the amendment for the direct election of Senators, and reciting the action of the legislatures of the various States. I was advised that the junior Senator from Indiana had stated that the Indiana Legislature had taken favorable action. My information has been that it has not taken any action, and I should like to inquire what information the Senator has in regard to that matter.

Mr. KERN. I have no information, Mr. President, except what I have obtained from the newspapers. I have a distinct recollection that the State senate passed the joint resolution and an indistinct recollection that I saw an account of the adoption of the joint resolution by the house of representatives. So I have had it in mind for some days that the Indiana Legislature had ratified the amendment. I can ascertain the fact this afternoon. I am quite sure it will be ratified. I will say to the Senator from Kansas there is no opposition in Indiana from any persons, so far as I know, to the ratification of the amendment. Both political parties have declared in favor of it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I bring this up because it may be that the information which I have been collecting is not wholly complete. I wrote a letter, I will say, to the presiding officers of each branch of the legislatures of all the States; and the response that I received from Indiana was that nothing had been done. That, however, was some days ago, and possibly the joint resolution may have been passed since that time. If convenient to the Senator from Indiana, I should be glad if he could advise the Senate before we adjourn whether or not the amendment has been ratified by the Legislature of Indiana.

Mr. KERN. I can state with a great deal of certainty that I think the amendment will be ratified by the Indiana Legislature.

Mr. BRISTOW. The State of Iowa has ratified the amendment and Kansas also. Kentucky has not, the legislature not being in session; neither has Louisiana, her legislature not being in session. The Legislature of the State of Maine has ratified the amendment. The State of Maryland has not ratified it, her legislature not being in session until next year.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, since the colloquy with the Senator from Kansas a moment ago, I have received definite and positive information that the constitutional amendment has been ratified by the Legislature of Indiana.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am very glad to learn of that. The State of Massachusetts has ratified the amendment, and so have Michigan and Minnesota. Mississippi has not ratified it. In Missouri the amendment has passed the lower house, but has not yet passed the senate; at least, I had a letter from the lieutenant governor of Missouri yesterday stating that no action had yet been taken in the senate. It passed the lower house in January.

Montana has ratified it; so have Nebraska, Nevada, and New Hampshire. In the State of New Jersey the house of representatives ratified it on February 4, but up to this time there has been no action taken by the State Senate of New Jersey, although, about 10 days ago, I think, a newspaper statement was made that the senate of New Jersey would ratify it, and I have been patiently waiting for that statement to be verified.

New York has ratified it; so have North Carolina, North Dakota, and Ohio. Oklahoma, my information is, has ratified it, the senate passing upon it last week, it having passed the house in January. Oregon has ratified it, and the Pennsylvania Legislature passed the joint resolution through the house with, I think, but three dissenting votes. That was on February 3. It is still before the senate committee of the legislature of that State and the senate has taken no action as yet.

In Rhode Island the legislature is in session, but has taken no action. South Carolina has taken no action. South Dakota has ratified the amendment. Tennessee has not ratified the amendment, its legislature having adjourned, I think, until the 18th of March. The Senators from that State have advised me that public sentiment is strongly in favor of the ratification of the amendment and that it will doubtless be ratified early after the legislature reconvenes this month. Texas has ratified the amendment. In Utah the resolution passed the house of representatives, but failed in the senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the resolution, as I am informed, passed the house in the Legislature of Utah with practically a unanimous vote. The resolution was voted upon some time ago in the State senate. The vote in favor of it was 9, and the vote against it was 7. The number of members of our State senate is 18, and under the constitution a majority of the 18 is required. Two members of the State senate were absent, so that I do not know how it would have fared if the membership had been full.

I understand from a newspaper statement that a day or two ago another vote was taken while five members of the State senate were absent, and the resolution again failed to receive a majority. A motion was entered, as the newspaper accounts state, to reconsider the vote on the resolution, but whether that has been taken up I am not advised. That is the present status of the matter in that State.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should have said that in New Mexico the house has ratified the amendment, but it is still hung up in the senate, as I am advised. Is that correct?

Mr. CATRON. That is true.

Mr. BRISTOW. Vermont has ratified the amendment, but Virginia has not, the legislature of that State, as I understand, not being in session. Washington has ratified it; so have West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming, making, up to date, 30 States having ratified the amendment, and it has passed one of the houses of 6 other States. If it should pass the other houses of these 6 States, then 36 States will have ratified the amendment. If it should fail in any one of those and be not ratified by either Florida or Tennessee or Georgia, then it would not be ratified this year; but if it shall be ratified by Tennessee and Florida, as I am advised it will be, then it will become a part of the Constitution, unless it should be rejected by 3 of the 6 States one branch of the legislature of which has already ratified the amendment. So it seems to me that the chances are that a sufficient number of States will have ratified the amendment this year to make it a part of the Constitution; but in the event that three of these States should fail to ratify it, then next year in the States of Kentucky, Maryland, and a number of others the legislatures will be in session, and the amendment will doubtless then be ratified.

I have brought this matter to the attention of the Senate, because I thought it would be of special interest, and also with the view of directing the attention of Senators and others interested in the ratification of the amendment to the fact that a number of legislatures have not yet acted upon it, and it has been suggested to me that in some of these instances the failure to act was probably due to lack of attention, a number of Senators having told me that action had not been taken in their States until they had taken up the subject with the members of the State legislature.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD I suggest another thought to the Senator from Kansas, which is that if this amendment is ratified it will be necessary for those States to make some change in their form of ballot for the next general election, and those legislatures that are in session may avoid a meeting of an extraordinary session of the State legislature by making that provision now.

Mr. BRISTOW. That matter has been discussed somewhat, and it is the opinion of some lawyers with whom I have talked that while it would be desirable to have the legislatures take this action, if the Senate situation requires that a Senator shall be elected by the people, the election officers of those States will be justified in making preparations for the people to vote for candidates for Senator as they do for State officers. Of course, that is a legal question with which I am wholly incompetent to deal.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator will permit me, in many of the States the election laws specifically name the offices for which candidates have a right to have their names placed upon the ballot, and they exclude all others; so that unless the legislatures shall amend such provisions of the statute, the placing of the name of a candidate for United States Senator on the ballot would be entirely without authorization and might be such a violation of the statutes of the State as to involve the validity of the election unless provision is made for placing on the ballots the names of candidates for United States Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not a lawyer, but it has been suggested that if the Constitution of the United States requires this to be done, it probably can be done in some way, even if the State has not provided the specific means of doing it. I do not know about that. Of course, it would be better if the legislatures should remove all doubt on the subject. In a number of States the names of candidates for Senator go on the ballot in any event, and are voted for at the election as instructions to the legislature.

The point that the Senator from South Dakota suggests is an important one, and I have taken this occasion to bring the matter before the Senate.

During the delivery of Mr. BRISTOW'S speech,

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I judge the Senator from Kansas expects to occupy some time. Would he mind yielding to me in order that I may make a conference report?

Mr. BRISTOW. That is all right.

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator from New Mexico also kindly yield for that purpose?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am sorry to say that I am compelled to report, as to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 26680), that the managers are unable to agree. The Senate by a vote of five to one, after we had obtained a full agreement, sent the bill back to conference on the House proposition to discontinue several assay offices. The conferees on the part of the House will not only not consent to report the bill back in a way to remedy the complaint, but they refuse to report it back even on the terms that we had been previously able to obtain. They went so far, in fact, as to state at first that they would not file any report whatever, but would let the bill die in conference; but, upon the representation that it seemed necessary that the record should be kept to show what the House would do, that they ought to report it to the House and get the action of the House upon it, they consented to sign, or at least two members of the conference committee on the part of the House consented to sign, the report, the other conferee being absent; but we parted with the statement that they would not present a report to the House.

Now, in strict parliamentary practice they should report to the House first, but I am unwilling to allow this session to close and this bill to die without having it reported to the Senate. I therefore send the report to the desk.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think I ought to say that the Senate conferees yielded to the House conferees on this item at the last moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will yield for a statement if it will take only a short time; but I desire to get through with my remarks, and this matter can be taken up and discussed later.

Mr. WARREN. We want to get to work on another bill.

Mr. BRISTOW resumed and concluded his speech, which appears in full above.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report upon the legislative, and so forth, appropriation bill, submitted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The report was agreed to.

CITIZENSHIP OF PORTO RICANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents three cablegrams from citizens of San Juan, P. R., in reference to legislation relating to that island now pending, and asks that they be printed in the RECORD.

The cablegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN JUAN, P. R., March 2, 1913.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Respectfully I transmit the following resolution of the House of Delegates of Porto Rico: The House of Delegates of Porto Rico considers it a very high honor for any human being of this world to be invested with American citizenship, but under present circumstances it prays that Congress take no action upon this matter without direct consultation and in accordance with the will of Porto Rican people, because there exist tendencies favorable and adverse to United States citizenship. For the Porto Ricans this resolution of the house of delegates does not affect its sentiments of adhesion and friendship toward the noble American people, but is inspired by its sentiments of respect and love for natural sovereignty of the people of Porto Rico.

JOSÉ DE DIEGO, Speaker.

SAN JUAN, P. R., March 2, 1913.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington:

Workers Federacion Regional of Porto Rico, representing great number of workers of island, request no declaration citizenship without consulting will of Porto Ricans.

AUQUINO, Presidente.

SAN JUAN, P. R., March 2, 1913.

SENATE, Washington:

Porto Ricans Civic Association petitions Senate not to legislate American citizenship without previously consulting Porto Rican people through plebiscite. Majority Porto Ricans wish to be only Porto Rican citizens.

HERNANDEZ LOPEZ, Presidente.

Mr. ROOT. I ask, in connection with the cablegrams relating to Porto Rico, to which the Chair has just referred, that there be also printed in the RECORD a letter from the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico to myself, with an inclosure of a letter from him to the chairman of the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COMMITTEE ON INSULAR AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, February 24, 1913.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The Senate Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico on the 20th instant had a meeting and agreed to report favorably to the Senate the bill to grant American citizenship to Porto Ricans.

As per information that has reached me, this step was taken with a view to have the Senate pass the bill during the present session, perhaps to-morrow or day after to-morrow. And in this connection I deem it opportune to send you copy of a brief I submitted before the said committee a few days ago and which, I suppose, was read at the meeting last Friday. My purpose in sending you this copy is to acquaint you with the true opinion of my country regarding this matter.

In expressing my personal view on the subject, suffice it for me to say without going deep into it, that it would seem untimely to hasten the grant of citizenship when there are conflicting opinions among the people to whom it is to be granted.

Very sincerely,

L. M. RIVERA,
Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico.

FEBRUARY 7, 1913.

To the honorable CHAIRMAN AND MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC ISLANDS AND PORTO RICO,
United States Senate.

GENTLEMEN: I have this day received from the House of Delegates of Porto Rico the following cablegram:

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 7, 1913.

LUIS MUÑOZ RIVERA,
Commissioner, Washington, D. C.:

In accordance with resolution of the house I am to-day forwarding to the chairman Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, Senate, the following cable: "The House of Delegates of Porto Rico considers it a very high honor for any human being of this world to be invested with American citizenship, but under present circumstances it prays that Congress take no action upon this matter without direct consultation and in accordance with the will of the Porto Rican people, because there exist tendencies favorable and adverse to United States citizenship for Porto Ricans. This resolution of the house does not affect its sentiments of adhesion and friendship toward the noble American people, but is inspired by its sentiments of respect and love for the natural sovereignty of the people of Porto Rico.

JOSÉ DE DIEGO, Speaker.

On January 18, 1912, when the bill to grant citizenship to the people of Porto Rico was being considered by the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, in executive session, I had the opportunity to lay before its members a cablegram that had just been received by me from the House of Delegates of Porto Rico, dated January 17, 1912, and reading as follows:

"MUÑOZ RIVERA, Washington:

"The house of delegates in yesterday's session resolved to ask you to petition the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives in Washington not to consider any bill relative to the granting of American citizenship to Porto Ricans unless said concession comes accompanied by a broad and just law for self-government for Porto Rico, with both houses elective and absolute power to legislate on local matters.

"JOSÉ DE DIEGO, Speaker."

In view of the contents of the above message, I made on that occasion the following statement before the said committee:

"For 13 years the people of Porto Rico have been asking to be granted American citizenship. No doubt the great majority of my countrymen would feel proud to call themselves American citizens. But they know that citizenship is almost wholly a sentimental matter, and that it does not solve the fundamental problem of the island, which is her self-government. Citizenship, unless it is accompanied by a liberal reform, will be an honorable title, but not a practical solution. We Porto Ricans prefer self-government without citizenship to citizenship without self-government. It would be a plain injustice to deny us citizenship. It would be a greater injustice yet to deny us an effective participation in the affairs under the control of the insular administration. The dissatisfaction now felt in Porto Rico will prevail until the most essential question be settled; that is, the one affecting our right to govern ourselves. On the other hand, we fear that if the reforms we are asking to be made are separated by introducing a bill on sanitation, as it was done some time ago, and now a bill for citizenship, and later on a bill containing general amendments to the Foraker Act, the first two might pass in Congress while the third one might not, the result being a greater centralization of authority in the executive branch of the government and a decrease of power in the people. In short, self-government, by itself, would produce the effect of a just and important concession; citizenship alone would engender a greater uneasiness, as proven by the telegraphic appeal from the house of delegates there, and also a stronger tendency toward pessimism, already manifesting itself, the existence of which could be justified if it is insisted upon governing us from the War Department, and on submitting us to an inferiority against which we protest.

"The Porto Ricans have a high interest in cooperating to the Americanization of Porto Rico. And this end will be rapidly reached if Congress does legislate in a way in accordance with the autonomic aspirations of the country, and if the local executive power complies with the laws, as it is its duty to do. If citizenship is granted and the general modification of the Foraker Act is delayed, my countrymen and myself will feel disappointed as to the hopes we always had in the American Nation and its republican institutions. I pray the committee to consider this matter and to settle it in a satisfactory way."

The committee, which I am honored to address, will see by the above documents that the people of Porto Rico, represented by the House of Delegates, the only elective body in the island, still persist upon their attitude and wish that the bill granting American citizenship to them be not considered at this time. As it seems that the gentlemen of the committee will soon take up this matter, I deem the precedent information of interest to them. My countrymen, having waited since 1898 for a measure of absolute and ample self-government, do expect to-day more than ever before that their hopes will soon be realized, Congress granting them American citizenship together with a law creating two elective houses, and investing them, through their representatives in both chambers, with power to make their laws to regulate all their local matters.

Very respectfully,

L. M. RIVERA,
Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a telegram from the Methodist Episcopal Sunday School of Philadelphia in reference to the Kenyon bill, which the Chair will likewise ask to have printed in the RECORD.

The telegram was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., March 2, 1913.

The honorable the SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

Resolved, That we commend the moral courage of the Congress of the United States in passing the Webb-Kenyon bill, congratulating them on having performed a valuable service for the youth of the country.

Members of the Intermediate Department of the Port Richmond Methodist Episcopal Sunday School, Philadelphia, Pa., in session assembled, Sunday afternoon, March 2, 1913.

LESTER FELIX, Secretary.

F. H. WAKEFIELD.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me, that I may offer a Senate resolution?

Mr. FALL. The Senator from New Mexico apparently has not had the floor for half an hour or so, but he will yield again with pleasure.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 497), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to F. H. Wakefield, for preparing the history of legislation for the Senate in the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, for carrying out his tracing and notification plan to Members of the Senate and clerks of committees, $1,200.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the statute the resolution will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood that it had gone to that committee, and that an amendment had been offered on the floor in response to that reference, and that it was objected to, the Senator who made the objection not understanding that this man had not been on the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator say that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate have reported on this resolution?

Mr. CURTIS. I understood from the chairman, over the telephone, that the committee had reported on the subject and offered it the other evening as an amendment to the general deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Not the same resolution, Mr. President, but a similar one.

Mr. CURTIS. A similar one.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. This one must go to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BRIGGS, subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the foregoing resolution, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26874) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have no desire to debate the motion made by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that the report of that committee be now taken up, but first——

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. DU PONT. Will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. DU PONT. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives in regard to Senate bill 8273, which is the bill donating condemned cannon, after which I shall submit a motion in regard to the matter.

That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 7, 30, and 32, and that the Senate agree to the other amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is too late now. My remarks were to have been addressed to the matter before the Senate which has now been disposed of.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

On March 2, 1913:

S. 8575. An act to authorize the town of Okanogan, Wash., to construct and maintain a bridge across the Okanogan River.

RURAL CREDITS IN EUROPE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132) providing for an American commission for the investigation of rural credits in Europe, which was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Secretary of State be authorized and requested to bespeak for the proposed American commission to investigate the European systems of rural credits, the diplomatic courtesies of the various European Governments.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26874) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have no desire to debate the motion of the chairman of the committee to take up the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill. I will perhaps debate an amendment very fully. However, before this matter is taken up I should like to know just what the parliamentary situation is at the present time. We have had no morning business, I believe. Some days ago I gave notice that immediately after the morning business on the following day I should address the Senate on a resolution at that time presented to the Senate. I still desire to address the Senate upon that subject. May I inquire what is the regular order? I make that as a parliamentary inquiry. The conference report on the Indian appropriation bill is not the unfinished business, is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from South Dakota precisely what motion he made. There has been so much intervening business that the Chair does not recall the exact terms of the motion.

Mr. GAMBLE. The motion I made was that the Senate adopt the conference report on House bill 26874, being the Indian appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report was submitted, the Chair understands, and that was the privilege of the Senator. The conference report is now before the Senate.

Mr. FALL. The motion to agree to the report brings the report before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report is before the Senate and open to discussion.

Mr. FALL. Very well, Mr. President. I should like to have the conference report read and the amendments proposed to be read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, I suggest that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	Lea	Smith, Md.
Borah	Dillingham	Lodge	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	du Pont	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Bradley	Fall	McLean	Smoot
Briggs	Fletcher	Myers	Stephenson
Bristow	Gallinger	Nelson	Sutherland
Bryan	Gamble	Newlands	Swanson
Burnham	Gardner	Oliver	Thomas
Burton	Gore	Owen	Tillman
Catron	Guggenheim	Page	Warren
Chamberlain	Jackson	Perkins	Webb
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, Me.	Pittman	Wetmore
Clarke, Ark.	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Works
Crane	Jones	Richardson
Crawford	Kern	Sheppard

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 58 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from New Mexico requests that the conference report be read, and that procedure will be had.

The Secretary read the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, which is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26874) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

JNO. H. STEPHENS,
CHAS. D. CARTER,
CHAS. H. BURKE,
Managers on the part of the House.

ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
MOSES E. CLAPP,
WM. J. STONE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to read the statement of the managers on the part of the House appended to the conference report.

Mr. FALL. No; I do not ask that that be done.

Mr. GAMBLE. That is not part of the report.

SERVICE PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me long enough to permit me to put through a very small bill?

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 28093, to amend the general pension act of May 11, 1912. It will take only a moment. I will state that the purpose of the bill is that soldiers who are now drawing pensions instead of having to file a new application when they reach an age at which they would be entitled to an additional amount may receive it automatically without the refiling of an application. While there is a little more in the bill, it simply restates the old law with that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, which proposes to amend the general pension act of May 11, 1912, by striking out section 5 and adding in lieu thereof a new section, to read as follows:

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions, as each application for pension filed under this act is adjudicated, to cause to be kept a record showing the name, length of service, and age of each claimant, the monthly rate of payment granted to or received by him, and the county and State of his residence; and shall at the end of the fiscal year 1914 tabulate the records so obtained by States and counties, and to furnish certified copies thereof upon demand and payment of such fee therefor as is provided by law for certified copies of records in the executive departments; and that further increase of rate under this act on account of advancing age shall be made without further application by pensioner and shall take effect and commence from the date he is shown by the aforesaid record to have attained the age provided by this act as a basis of rating: Provided, That where a claim has been heretofore adjudicated and the record therein does not sufficiently establish the date of birth of the soldier or sailor pensioner nothing herein shall prevent such further investigation as is deemed necessary, in order to establish a record upon which future increases of rate under this act, on account of advancing age, may be possible, the object being to advance automatically the rate of pension, as provided for by this act, without unnecessary expense to the pensioner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I should like to ask the chairman of the Senate Committee on Pensions to state what changes were made in the section.

Mr. McCUMBER. The only change made is in this provision:

And that further increase of rate under this act on account of advancing age shall be made without further application by pensioner, and shall take effect and commence from the date he is shown by the aforesaid record to have attained the age provided by this act as a basis of rating—

So that the law will act automatically, without the refiling of an application.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico,' approved May 11, 1912."

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not recall that I have asked for present consideration of anything at this session, but there is one bill here for which I would like present consideration. It will take only a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield for that purpose?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. BACON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 25781. As I say, it will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 25781) to amend section 77 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after line 6, page 1, and insert:

Terms of the district court for northern division of said district shall be held at Atlanta on the second Monday in March and the first Monday in October, and at Gainesville on the fourth Mondays in April and November, and it shall be the duty of the judge of said court to assign for trial at Gainesville such cases, both civil and criminal, as may in his judgment be most convenient to the parties to said cases and as may be in the interest of economical expenditures by the Government.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 77 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

Terms of the district court for northern division of said district shall be held at Atlanta on the second Monday in March and the first Monday in October, and at Gainesville on the fourth Mondays in April and November, and it shall be the duty of the judge of said court to assign for trial at Gainesville such cases, both civil and criminal, as may in his judgment be most convenient to the parties to said cases and as may be in the interest of economical expenditures by the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BACON subsequently said: The Senate a few moments ago, upon my request, passed a bill the amendment to which was inaccurately copied.

I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill (H. R. 25781) to amend section 77 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now before the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the amendment as it was put into the report of the committee, but not correctly copied in the bill, may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment as printed in the bill, after the following words in said section, to wit, "terms of the district court for northern division of said district shall be held at Atlanta on the second Monday in March and the first Monday in October," add the following:

and at Gainsville on the fourth Mondays in April and November, and it shall be the duty of the judge of said court to assign for trial at Gainsville such cases, both civil and criminal, as may in his judgment be most convenient to the parties to said cases and as may be in the interest of economical expenditures by the Government.

So that said sentence in said section 77, when so amended, will read as follows:

Terms of the district court for northern division of said district shall be held at Atlanta on the second Monday in March and the first Monday in October and at Gainsville on the fourth Mondays in April and November, and it shall be the duty of the judge to assign such cases, both civil and criminal, as may in his judgment be most convenient to the parties to said cases, and as may be in the interest of economical expenditures by the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT N. CAMPBELL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6877) to reinstate Robert N. Campbell as a first lieutenant in the Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army, which was, on page 2, line 3, after the word "appointment" to insert: "but nothing in this bill shall be construed to increase the total authorized commissioned strength of the Army."

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. This is a bill which was introduced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I have referred the matter to him, and he says he desires the Senate to concur in the amendment of the House. I therefore make that motion.

The amendment was agreed to.

CORA EVANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives, and calls the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to it.

The bill (H. R. 27090) for the relief of Cora Evans was read the first time by its title.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Cora Evans, widow of Joseph E. Evans, the sum of $1,320, this being the amount of the annual salary of the said Joseph E. Evans, who at the time of his death was an employee of the Bureau of Mines and came to his death on April 7, 1911, in a mine at Throop, Lackawanna County, Pa., while engaged, under the direction of the Bureau of Mines, in the hazardous employment of leading a rescue party, following a mine fire, in an attempt to rescue miners supposed to be barricaded at the face of the mine.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NELSON. A lighthouse bill has just come over from the House involving aids to navigation along our navigable waters. We passed separate bills here in the Senate many months ago. The House has put them into an omnibus bill, and if anything can be done with the bill it ought to pass so that the appropriations may be put into a deficiency appropriation bill. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. GAMBLE. In view of the statement made by the Senator from Minnesota and the importance of the measure to which he refers, if it does not lead to discussion, I will withdraw objection.

Mr. NELSON. It will lead to none at all.

Mr. GAMBLE. But I give notice that I shall be compelled to insist upon the consideration of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the bill from the House may be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26874) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it will be necessary for me to occupy some considerable time of the Senate in the discussion of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill now under consideration. I will, before concluding my arguments, possibly have an opportunity to comment upon more than one provision in the bill. In opening my argument, however, I shall direct my attention—and ask the attention of the Senate to what I shall have to say—particularly to amendment 81, providing for and continuing the appropriation for the removal of the Fort Sill Apaches from Oklahoma or from the Fort Sill Reservation in Oklahoma as prisoners of war, now under jurisdiction of the Secretary of War, and the placing of these Indians upon lands to be selected for them by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. President, these Fort Sill Apaches were known as the Geronimo Apaches. They were renegade Indians from various reserves in the then Territory of Arizona and the northern part of the Republic of Mexico, particularly the State of Sonora. Prior to the year 1886 nearly every year Indians from the San Carlos, Chiricahua, Aguacaliente, or Ojo Caliente (or Hot Springs), and other reserves in the then Territory of Arizona and the new State of Arizona left the reservations and, attacking everyone whom they met, joined their brothers who lived on the Chiricahua Reservation, particularly those who lived on the border line between Arizona and old Mexico, and some of whom lived in old Mexico, going down through Sonora and making their way into the eastern portion of the State of Chihuahua, through the little Mexican settlements in those two States, making the present town and the then old town of Casas Grandes largely their headquarters, or ultimate point of attack.

These Indians were in the habit not only of depredating upon the Mexicans in the Republic of Mexico, but also of coming back across the line into the then Territory now State of New Mexico and into the then Territory now State of Arizona. When they were on the warpath these Indians made their headquarters as a general thing in the Republic of Mexico. Whenever they took the warpath and started on their career of depredation and of murder, as fast as it was possible for them to travel they made their way to the friendly shelter of old Mexico.

The northern part of Sonora, a great portion of the present State of Sonora, in the Republic of Mexico, and large areas of the present State of Chihuahua were depopulated by these Indians. Where the present settlements of the Mormons, 10 to 15 in number, exist or existed up to two years ago in Chihuahua and Sonora no Mexican dared to go because of these Apaches.

There are yet some 12 or 13 of them living near a mining camp, in which I have a small interest, in the Sierra Madres, near the line of Chihuahua and Sonora, at the junction of what is known as the Bonita and the Rio Verde de Aros. These 13 are the remnant of the old Geronimo Band of Indians who were not captured by Lawton and Miles, or at least they constituted a large portion of the number who were not captured. Some 9 of them were captured a few years ago, and within the last five years, against the protest of the people of New Mexico, were sent to the Mescalero reserve in New Mexico.

The raids of these Indians from old Mexico back into New Mexico caused much trouble. So many hundreds of lives were lost that finally the Government of the United States determined that it would pursue these Indians when they made their next raid into New Mexico, with the armed forces of the United States, which theretofore had been compelled to stop at the border of old Mexico, and to pursue them to their lair in the Sierra Madre Mountains of old Mexico, leave was sought from the Mexican Government and finally, with reluctance, it was agreed that our armed forces might cross the border.

The first result of this policy was that Capt. Crawford was killed by regular Mexican soldiers while pursuing the Geronimo band of Indians into the State of Sonora. Crawford was followed by Lawton, with whom was, as a volunteer, the present head of the Army of the United States, then Capt. Leonard Wood. These Indians were brought back by the armed forces of the United States from Mexico, brought into Arizona, and taken from thence to Fort Marion, Fla., and afterwards to Fort Sill, in Oklahoma, in the now State of Oklahoma. There they have been guarded.

They were placed upon the military reservation at Fort Sill. Large additions have from time to time, or at least twice, been made to that reserve for the accommodation of those Indians.

Mr. President, just picture the conditions existing on the border in 1886 and the action of the soldiers of the United States in pursuing these renegade Apaches across the Mexican border, there surrounding them, and bringing them back to be dealt with to some extent at least as the law provided, at any rate placing them as prisoners of war in Fort Marion and later at Fort Sill, where it was impossible for them to continue in their career of murder.

In contrast to this action of our Government, in contrast to this position of the armed forces of the United States at that time, I want to call the attention of Senators to present-day conditions, and conditions as they have existed for the last two years, just across the border of Arizona and New Mexico in the Republic of Mexico.

Armed forces of the United States have been along the border of the United States, in Arizona, Texas, California, and New Mexico, just north of the line dividing these States from Sonora, Chihuahua, Coahuila, Tamaulipas, and Lower California; but those soldiers have been placed there, Mr. President, upon an entirely different mission. When they went to the line or went across the line in 1886 they were sent there for the purpose of protecting American citizens and for the purpose of protecting the helpless Mexicans in Sonora and Chihuahua from outrage at the hands of these Indians, from having their property stolen, from having their homes devastated and their children carried off into captivity or worse than captivity.

Mr. President, at the last session of Congress, having had its attention called to the present-day conditions just across the line of Arizona and New Mexico and Texas, the Senate of the United States appointed a committee to deal with certain matters which were supposed possibly to have excited or led up to some of the conditions, at least, existing in Mexico. That committee during the recess of Congress was engaged, in pursuance of the resolution under which it was appointed, in collecting evidence. Incidental to the chief matter of inquiry under the resolution to which I have referred—and, I might say, as directly bearing upon it, because it was necessary for the committee to go into the particular character of evidence, to which I shall refer—in pursuing the main line of its investigation a great mass of testimony was taken along the border and from San Diego, in California, to New Orleans, San Antonio, and El Paso, in Texas, and at various other places, including Washington. The result—or a portion, at any rate, of the result—of this investigation has been placed on the desks of Members of the Senate, and embraces fully 900 pages of printed matter.

During this investigation, Mr. President, your committee came in contact with the armed forces of the United States ranged along the border, and through evidence offered incidentally to the main purpose of its examination ascertained from the testimony of witnesses the purpose, or apparent purpose, animating the placing or bringing about the placing of the armed forces of the United States upon the Mexican border.

I am going to refer, Mr. President, to some of the evidence taken in this investigation as showing the conditions in Mexico as existing to-day, and I am going to refer to some of the evidence taken in this case as showing how the armed forces of the United States, instead of being used to protect American citizens, have been used to arrest American citizens in their own homes on this side of the border, have been used to search American citizens illegally under the Constitution of the United States, have been used to oppress American citizens in their own country, and not to protect them here nor elsewhere, not to render them necessary assistance when they were being murdered and robbed and outraged and calling for help to their countrymen on this side of the border and that the American soldiers were standing within a mile in some instances, and even a shorter distance, when American citizens were being seized and held for ransom, robbed, and their property taken away from them, their lives threatened, and deprived of their liberty. The American soldiers on the border, at the dictation of a Mexican consul on this side, have been searching and arresting American citizens charged with no offense and proceeding quietly along the streets of an American city of 50,000 population; and this not upon a single occasion, not by a mistake in orders. This has been the condition on the border of Mexico since practically the 14th day of March of last year, within 10 days of one full year.

Mr. President, in July of last year in this Chamber I made some remarks concerning the conditions as they existed in Mexico at that time and what I conceived to be the position of the American people on this side of the line interested in those conditions.

In the course of my remarks upon that occasion I referred to certain acts of this administration, and particularly of the State Department of this administration, citing instances in which, as I claim, the records showed that this Government has not extended to the Americans in Mexico not only the protection to which they are entitled, but the protection which could have been extended to them without causing any difficulty between the United States and Mexico.

I know that I was criticized in some quarters for my statement then. It was asserted that I was extremely radical. But I notice that while I made here openly statements, claiming them to be from the record, which were resented apparently by some of the officials of this administration, no attempt whatsoever has been made to answer them by these officials of the Government. So I must conclude that the statements were unanswerable, or else that no attention was being paid by the Government of the United States to the interests of Americans who happened, temporarily or permanently, to be located across the border in some other country. I must then infer that it was the determination of the present administration to let the world know that it might compete with the foreign trade of the United States in any country in which our business men sought trade or business, with the understanding that where our business men sent their representatives, for instance, to Japan, China, Mexico, one of the Central American Republics, or anywhere else, to obtain business such representatives of our firms and business men would under no circumstances receive protection from this country. It apparently has been the policy of this Government to say to those other nations that "you may go there and get business; Great Britain may protect her citizens there if attacked; but that even when our citizens, the representatives of our business men, attending to their business, obeying the laws of the country, are willfully attacked, even because of their American citizenship, the American Government will under no circumstances resent such attack or extend to these citizens the protection which our forefathers at least thought that we would always give to American citizens wherever found."

Mr. President, about the time to which I referred at the last session, when I made remarks upon the Mexican situation, or just after, the matter of the then conditions in Nicaragua came up. I remember that those conditions were discussed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] particularly, who, in the course of some remarks which he made upon this subject, said that the conditions in Mexico were far worse than in Nicaragua, and that if we were justified in going into Nicaragua with the marines and the sailors of the United States Navy for the purpose of keeping open communication between Corinto and Managua, and for the purpose of protecting American lives, we were much more justified in sending the forces necessary from the United States into Mexico to protect American lives and property in that Republic. I agreed with him then and I agree with him now.

Mr. President, in view of the fact that our marines were sent into Nicaragua, that our armed forces restored order and took part in a revolution there, upon one side of it, and it has been refused to permit them to do so in Mexico, so as to extend protection to American citizens and to demand of the Mexican Government payment for American property destroyed, I should like to know why some report has not been made to the only body which can legally and finally act in matters of this kind in the event any action of the administration brought on a war with another country?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Wyoming in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. I have heard that the marines of the United States who were used to interfere in the Nicaraguan troubles are still being used for that purpose. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Mexico if he has any information as to whether or not that rumor is true?

Mr. FALL. I am informed that some of the marines were sent into Nicaragua for purposes of which we know nothing except as reported by the newspapers, and also am informed that some marines yet remain there. I have no information except from newspapers and certain private correspondence with persons in the so-called Republic of Nicaragua. I have no other information, because none had been furnished this body before the Senator from Colorado came into it or since by any officer of the Government so far as I know. No message or information upon this subject has been sent in here.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. I beg to occupy a few moments to make a statement in regard to the status of the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 28812).

That bill was referred to your committee of conference, Mr. President, some three or four days since, containing 58 amendments. We gave it careful consideration, and the committee of conference have agreed on all except one of the amendments. That amendment provides for two battleships, while the House bill provides for only one battleship. We desire to make a report to the Senate on what we have done. The conferees on the part of the other House decline to make any further report of the disagreement, for the reason, they say, that the question has already been passed upon by the House. I therefore, Mr. President, submit a statement of the Senate managers of the conference, which I ask to have read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATEMENT.

The conferees on the naval appropriation bill have been unable to agree upon one of the principal items in the bill, and there seems to be no hope of coming to an agreement.

On the amendments to the bill not affected by this item, the situation is as follows:

On page 3 of the bill, line 25, an increase of pay of 35 per cent for officers detailed as actual fliers of heavier-than-air craft is allowed, instead of 50 per cent, as passed by the House.

Amendment No. 5: The House recedes with an amendment authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow disbursements heretofore made in accordance with regulations of the Secretary of the Navy for commutation of subsistence to the members of the Nurse Corps of the Navy at the rate of 75 cents per day, but does not authorize such an allowance in the future.

Amendment No. 11: Authorizes the Auditor for the Navy Department to credit the account of Pay Director John N. Amendment No. 20: Makes available until expended the appropriation for procuring ammunition for ships of the Navy.

Amendment No. 21: Provides for the purchase of land for necessary sites for radio shore stations, with an amendment limiting the amount to be expended for such purpose to $50,000.

Amendment No. 22: Increases the appropriation for "coal and transportation" by $75,000, which is to be used for procuring coal from Alaska to be tested for Navy purposes; and repeals section 1552, Revised Statutes, which authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to establish suitable depots for coal and other fuel at such places as he may deem necessary.

Amendment No. 34: Provides that the appropriation for "Provisions, Navy," shall be available until the close of the fiscal year 1915, and that thereafter awards of contracts for provisions for the Navy shall be made by individual items, the contract being awarded to the lowest responsible bidder.

Amendment No. 35: The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 36: Provides $100,000 for the purchase of necessary land and buildings for a Naval Academy dairy, with a proviso that the land shall not cost more than $75,000 and that the Treasury of the United States be reimbursed for the full amount from the profits of the midshipman's store fund.

It also provides for the sale to officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees of such articles of subsistence as may from time to time be designated in the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

Page 51 of the bill, line 6, is a change of total.

Amendment No. 51: Provides for one transport, to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $1,850,000.

Amendment No. 52: Provides for one supply ship, to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $1,425,000.

On the Senate amendments to provide for two battleships instead of one battleship the conferees are in disagreement.

These are amendments numbered 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 54, 55, 56, 57, and 58.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I have made this statement to the Senate, and I desire to ask instructions as to what further action they wish the conferees on the part of the Senate to take in the matter, for without further action the naval appropriation bill will fail to become a law at this session of Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from California if the conferees on the part of the House have refused to sign any kind of a report?

Mr. PERKINS. I will say, as is said in the statement which I sent to the desk, that they decline to make a statement to the House of the disagreement for the reason, as they said, that the matter had already been passed upon by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMOOT. The House conferees having refused absolutely, as I understand, there is nothing that the Senate can now do but simply to wait for some report from the conferees.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senate instructs its members of the committee of conference to recede from the battleship amendment, then there would be no objection on the part of the House conferees to the bill becoming a law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California make a motion to that effect?

Mr. PERKINS. No; I do not, Mr. President, for the reason that I am in favor of two battleships.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not see that anything further can be done under the circumstances, except to lay the statement on the table and await the report of the conferees.

Mr. THOMAS. I will make the motion that the conferees recede from the amendment providing for two battleships, which is now the subject of difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield for that purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the only question involved in this statement.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from California said that if we receded from that amendment the conferees could agree, as I understood him.

Mr. PERKINS. They promised to agree if we receded from that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I sincerely trust that the Senate will not agree to recede from that amendment.

Mr. FALL. I yield for the motion made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]; but I think we had better have a quorum, and I call for a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Catron	du Pont	Johnston, Ala.
Bankhead	Chamberlain	Fall	Jones
Bourne	Chilton	Fletcher	Lea
Bradley	Clapp	Foster	Lippitt
Brady	Clark, Wyo.	Gallinger	Lodge
Brandegee	Clarke, Ark.	Gamble	McCumber
Briggs	Crawford	Gardner	Myers
Bristow	Culberson	Gronna	Nelson
Bryan	Dillingham	Guggenheim	O'Gorman
Burton	Dixon	Johnson, Me.	Oliver
Owen	Pomerene	Smith, Mich.	Thornton
Page	Richardson	Smoot	Tillman
Paynter	Root	Stone	Townsend
Penrose	Sheppard	Sutherland	Watson
Perkins	Smith, Ga.	Swanson	Webb
Pittman	Smith, Md.	Thomas	Williams.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask what is pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the pending question is the motion made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that the Senate recede from its amendment providing for two battleships.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to submit the point of order that there is nothing before the Senate which would permit that instruction to the conferees. The statement which has been read is only a statement of facts made by the Senator from California. It is not in the nature of a report, and should the conferees make a report the report would first have to go to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask where are the original papers relating to this appropriation bill?

Mr. PENROSE. I understand they are with the House of Representatives. The House conferees have declined to sign a report or to go back to the House on the pending issue, and there is no assurance that the conferees may not meet later in the day. The House has the papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So that the motion relates to a matter that is now in the possession of the House of Representatives. Is that correct?

Mr. PENROSE. Absolutely.

Mr. LODGE. There is nothing, Mr. President, in this case before either the Senate or the House.

Mr. PENROSE. Neither is there any assurance, Mr. President, that the conferees may not meet later in the day, although there is no probability that such meeting can occur unless the attitude of the House managers is changed.

Mr. ROOT. That has been known to happen.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; it has been known to happen. I think it is only fair to say to the Senate that the Senate conferees feel that they can not logically be called upon to surrender the amendment providing for two battleships, which was adopted by the Senate by such an overwhelming majority, until the Senate amendment is formally voted upon by the House of Representatives. That the House managers have declined up to the present time to permit, and it does not seem to me reasonable or logical for them to insist upon the Senate managers surrendering while they are unwilling to return to the House and get final instructions from that body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to make the point of order that, under the rules of the Senate, the motion can not be entertained?

Mr. PENROSE. I make the point of order that there is nothing before the Senate and that this matter is in the possession of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be glad to hear Senators on the point of order. It is a very important matter.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am not sufficiently familiar with the procedure of this body to attempt to discuss such a point of order as that which has just been made. The chairman of the committee caused to be read from the Secretary's desk a statement which gave us information as to the status of the naval appropriation bill before the committee of conference. After that statement was read the chairman, in response to an inquiry from the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], said that no further progress could be made with this bill in the absence of some action on the part of the Senate, and that he himself would not make a motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Not upon the bill, Mr. President; he said upon the report.

Mr. THOMAS. I am speaking now of what the chairman said, as I understood him—that he himself would not make a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Colorado kindly permit the occupant of the chair to say a word?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not presiding at the time this matter came before the Senate, so that the only information the Chair can get is from the paper that has been handed to him. It appears to be not a conference report, and is not signed by the conferees. It is merely a statement of the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate. It is proper that the Chair should make that statement.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am aware, of course, that there was another occupant of the chair at the time that I made the motion which is now the subject of discussion. The chairman of the committee having said that he himself would not make it because he was in favor of two battleships, I made it because I am in favor of not more than one battleship.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in this particular case the movement of the papers was somewhat different from the usual course. In order to expedite business, after the Senate had amended the naval appropriation bill and passed it, I made the motion that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives. Usually in such cases the bill goes back to the House with the Senate amendments; the House asks for a conference and we assent. There is no question that the papers are in the hands of the assenting House. In this case the House assented to the conference and has the papers. If the Chair will turn to Jefferson's Manual, with which, of course, he is familiar, he will see that there can be no question about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is familiar with that.

Mr. LODGE. The papers, therefore, are not in the possession of the Senate, and there is nothing in regard to this matter in the possession of the Senate. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has merely made a statement to inform the Senate of the condition of the conference. No disagreement has been signed and no formal action has been taken.

In the case of motions to discharge conferees there is, as a matter of fact, only one precedent, and that I had occasion to look up this morning with some care in relation to a wholly dissimilar case where the situation was entirely different. It occurred in connection with the famous tariff bill of 1894, when a motion was made in the House to agree to the Senate amendments and pass the bill, discharging the conferees. That bill had been to conference. I will not go into all the details, but I will read the last clause showing the decision of Mr. Speaker Crisp. It was a decision, I may say, about which there was great doubt at the time. It was disputed with great ability by Mr. Reed, who, as is well known, was one of the greatest parliamentarians either House has ever had. Even on the ground taken by Mr. Crisp this case is not covered. The Speaker said:

> Now, the object of all conferences between the two Houses is to get the minds of the Houses together to pass the bill. The Senate conferees are insisting upon the Senate amendments. The House conferees are insisting upon the rejection of those amendments. That conference committee is now in existence and it has been held in the case just indicated that, pending that condition of affairs, the House which has rejected the amendment may recede from that action and permit the bill to become a law.

Under that decision the House might possibly take this action, though I think even that very doubtful in this condition, because in the case of the tariff the bill has been in conference, amendments have been agreed to, and so forth. But this is clearly not a case where this body can act. The papers are with the House. The House projected the provision. The House may possibly be able to recede; but there is no action possible, even under the sole authority that exists—as I say, the disputed authority—to deal with that decision here.

I say that with reference to the point of order made by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I simply wish to reiterate and to impress on every Senator here the condition in which the conferees are placed.

The Senate, by a large majority, have placed an amendment in the naval bill. The House conferees decline to permit a vote in the House of Representatives on that amendment. Can the Senate afford, with any consideration for their prerogatives or their dignity, to recede, even if they had the power, without having an opportunity to have the verdict of the House of Representatives on the amendment which they have put in?

Further than that, however, I entirely concur with the Senator from Massachusetts that the matter is in the hands of the House; that it is not within the jurisdiction of the Senate at the present time; and that the motion is not in order.

Mr. LODGE. I also call attention to a matter in our own precedents. I was reading from the celebrated precedent, if I may so call it, of the House of Representatives. I now read this statement in our own precedents, from page 259:

> In earlier practice reports of inability to agree were made verbally, and conference reports were not signed.
>
> Where managers of a conference are unable to agree, or where a report is disagreed to in either House, another conference is usually asked.

Now:

> A conference having failed to reach a result, the two Houses, successively, as they come into possession of the papers, act on the amendments in disagreement, further insisting, or receding and concurring.

The House must act first in this case, because they have the papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had occasion at one time to look into this matter, and was impressed with the suggestion that was made, as the Chair remembers, by Mr. Speaker Reed, that it would be an anomalous situation if, simultaneously, a motion of this kind might be made on the part of both Houses, the point being that one or the other of the Houses must have jurisdiction to the exclusion of the other.

In the present instance the papers are indisputably in the custody of the House of Representatives; and there is nothing, as the Chair looks at the situation, for the Senate to do in the case. The Chair will not undertake to settle the powers of the House, which has possession of the papers, but is strongly and completely of the opinion that under existing circumstances the point of order must lie against the motion made by the Senator from Colorado, and hence sustains the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. Before this matter passes from the Senate, since the Chair has just referred to Mr. Reed's statement about simultaneousness, I should like to read it into the RECORD. It was on the tariff bill, where, as I have just said, a case had arisen in which the House was seeking to recede from its objections to the Senate amendments. It is found on page 8469 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 13, 1894, volume 26, part 8, Fifty-second Congress, second session.

I shall have to read a few lines to make it clear:

> Nevertheless, that is where the bill is, and the Senate to-day is proposing action upon it, and the House to-day is proposing action upon it, the House having repented of its bill and the Senate having repented of its bill also, and there being at this moment no assenting agreement possible between the two bodies, because each one of them is very properly ashamed of its own offspring and disgusted with the offspring of the other. Now it is proposed that one body—the body which has not the papers—shall proceed to take action and actually climb over every legal obstacle in order to get at the nauseous meal which has been set before them, the nature of which they themselves have described.
> * * * * * * *
>
> Thus far it has the opposition of both Houses, and this House is endeavoring to take a snap judgment, ready to take what it has so utterly denounced on all occasions for fear of worse.
>
> Mr. DUNN. For fear of McKinleyism.
> Mr. REED. The Senate, on the other hand, is contemplating some sort of action on this question. Now, suppose that should happen to be simultaneous.

This is the point the Chair made:

> Suppose that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Dunn], who just interrupted me, should succeed in his effort to swallow what he has been unwilling even to look at. Suppose he should adorn his record by this interesting backdown. Suppose he should be wreathed and garlanded by this action. He was rather late in getting upon the roll of honor. He seems to be ahead in getting on the roll of dishonor. Suppose the Senate at the same moment should demand the bill for the purpose of taking other action upon it. What situation should we be in?

That covers the point of simultaneousness perfectly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that at the hour of 6 o'clock a recess shall be taken until the hour of 8 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LIEN FOR TAXES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25780) to amend section 3186 of the Revised Statutes of the United States having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "situated," at the end of the bill as it was passed by the Senate, add the following proviso: "Provided further, That whenever any State, by appropriate legislation, authorizes the filing of such notice in the office of the registrar or recorder of deeds of the counties of that State, or in the State of Louisiana in the parishes thereof, then such lien shall not be valid in that State as against any mortgager, purchaser, or judgment creditor until such notice shall be filed in the office of the registrar or recorder of deeds of the county or counties, or parish or parishes in the State of Louisiana, within which the property subject to the lien is situated."

FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
ELIHU ROOT,
T. H. PAYNTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
H. D. CLAYTON,
W. W. RUCKER,
JOHN A. STERLING,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FALL. I did not exactly understand the order which was made a moment ago. The motion was to take a recess from 6 to 8 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order was made.

Mr. FALL. And I have the floor, I presume?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; the Senator has the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I suggested not long since that the matter before the Senate is the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, and that action should be had thereon. I am anxious to accommodate Senators, but the preparation of this bill in the House consumed an immense amount of time, and the same is true of its consideration by the Senate committee. It has received long and exhaustive consideration, and I feel that it ought to be heard and determined by the Senate.

I have been greatly interested in the argument presented by the Senator from New Mexico, but it does not seem to me, under the amendment proposed by the Senate and made a part of this bill and which has been agreed to in conference, that any substantial objections can be made to it. In the appropriation act of last year provision was made for the relief and support of the Apache Indians now held as prisoners of war——

Mr. FALL. I think I have the floor, and I yielded to the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. GAMBLE. If I am compelled I shall insist, as I gave notice before, that the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill shall be proceeded with. I simply ask the indulgence of the Senate to call its attention to the fact. If the Senator simply wants to put his bill in conference and if it will lead to no discussion, I will not object.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am obliged to go into conference at 7 o'clock. I do not know how long I will be engaged there. I submitted, early this morning, a motion to concur in the amendments of the House to the so-called compensation act. I understand that that motion is really pending, and I should like to dispose of the matter. It is about the only opportunity I will have before the conference is held at 7 o'clock.

Mr. GAMBLE. I had hoped that the matter pending before the Senate would be disposed of, for it will be necessary for me to go into conference later on this evening. If the matter the Senator from Utah has in charge is not to provoke discussion, as far as I am concerned I will interpose no objection; but I do feel that the measure pending before the Senate is of such importance that I should insist upon its being considered and disposed of at the earliest moment possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had overlooked the fact that the Senator from Utah had once before called up this matter from the House, and the Chair will lay it before the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can not say that it will not lead to discussion. I think it will lead to discussion.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS TO EMPLOYEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5382) to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries, resulting in disability or death, to employees of common carriers by railroad engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. The amendments have once been read.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the amendments of the House be concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah to agree to the House amendments.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to be heard briefly, Mr. President.

Mr. FALL. I am perfectly willing to yield to any Senator if the Senator from Utah will just suspend one moment. The debate upon the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill is going to occupy considerable time. I will say to the chairman of the committee I am perfectly willing to yield to other Senators having important matters that demand attention, but I am not thoroughly familiar with the rules of the Senate and I yield provided I do not lose my position, and that I do not make myself subject to the rule that no Senator shall speak more than twice on the same subject in one day. With the understanding that that does not occur I will yield to any Senator who has a pressing matter to bring before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will not lose his right by yielding.

Mr. GAMBLE. I suggested when this matter was brought up that if it would provoke discussion I would interpose an objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rules of the Senate it is obligatory upon the Chair to lay down a message from the House, or it may be called up by any Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But having laid it down, it can not again be taken up by the Senate except upon motion favorably acted upon by the Senate. A mere message from the House does not control the mode of procedure in the Senate beyond presenting it to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the motion is not in order over objection unless the Senate determines to take it up and proceed with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand this matter will take only a few minutes, and that the Senator from Utah will not press his motion when he understands that we on this side will desire to discuss each of those 98 amendments.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, I quite understand the situation. The Senator from Georgia and others upon the other side of the Chamber are very much opposed to this bill, and I understand that such discussion will be had upon the amendments that time will not permit our taking a vote upon it. I think that is the situation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it is utterly impossible to consider those amendments satisfactorily before 12 o'clock tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that having presented the message to the Senate, an objection to its present consideration will lie unless a motion be made to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. It will not take us long to dispose of it.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator means the conference report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it is a Senate bill with House amendments.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. GAMBLE. I understand that, of course, this will displace the present order of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will displace it if agreed to.

Mr. GAMBLE. And there is notice given here that it will lead to endless discussion upon 98 amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Senate bill with House amendments.

The question being put, there were, upon a division—ayes 18, noes 6.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not a quorum has voted. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Fall	McLean	Simmons
Borah	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Bradley	Gallinger	Myers	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Gamble	Nelson	Smith, Mich.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll 51 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To save time I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to have the motion restated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a Senate bill with House amendments—Senate bill 5382—"An act to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries," and so forth.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Texas that the roll has just been called and a quorum is present. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Utah, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I wish to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRADLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I notice that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is not in the Chamber. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON] and will let my vote stand yea.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently, but I desire my vote to stand with the announcement that I transfer my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to inquire if the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I wish to withdraw my vote.

Mr. STONE. I inquire whether the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. STONE. I have a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. CULBERSON. I transfer my general pair with that Senator to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withhold my vote. I have a general pair with that Senator.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 10, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5382) to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries, resulting in disability or death, to employees of common carriers by railroads engaged in interstate or foreign commerce or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement about this bill. The bill was introduced in the Senate something more than a year ago. It was reported out of the Judiciary Committee after a very full hearing and investigation of the subject, and passed the Senate on March 1, 1913. It went to the House, was there referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House. It was reported out of the Judiciary Committee of the House by a vote of 16 to 5 of that committee, as I am informed. The bill passed the Senate by a vote of 64 for to 15 against. It passed the House yesterday by a vote of more than two-thirds of the membership of the House in favor of the bill, as I recall—218 in favor of the bill to about 80 or 81 against it.

The bill has been fully considered in both Houses. The bill comes back to the Senate with 98 amendments. A vast majority of those amendments are formal in character, to which nobody could have any objection. There are a few of the amendments that are material in character. One of the amendments proposes to increase the maximum amount of compensation which will be allowed. Under the bill as it passed the Senate provision was made for a maximum compensation of $50 a month and a minimum of $25 a month. The House has increased that to a maximum of $60 a month.

According to the statistics, which were gathered very carefully by the commission which had this matter in charge, the number of employees in the Railway Mail Service who sustain injury during the course of a year or are killed, whose salaries are more than $100 a month, and therefore who would receive compensation exceeding $50 a month, are 15 per cent. As nearly as I can estimate it, perhaps 10 per cent, that is two-thirds of the 15 per cent, would receive the enlarged compensation of $60 a month, which would add $10 a month.

The figures which we originally gathered show that the railroad companies of this country for this class of injuries and deaths were paying approximately $10,500,000 per annum. Under the terms of the bill as reported to the Senate originally the railroad companies would be obliged to pay for the same injuries and deaths approximately $15,000,000 in the manner provided by the bill.

Under the amendments which were adopted by the Senate, as nearly as we could estimate, something like $3,000,000 would be added to the bill, making the approximate amount paid under the bill about $18,000,000.

As nearly as we can estimate it, the amendments made by the House in the respect to which I have called attention would add approximately another million dollars to the bill, which then would require the payment upon the part of the railroad companies of approximately $19,000,000 per annum, as against $10,500,000.

Mr. President, those figures as I have given them are not mere guesses; they are based upon statistics most carefully gathered and upon computations made by experts whom the commission obtained from the Census Bureau. So they may be regarded as accurate.

Therefore we have this situation: There are in the United States on the various railways 1,700,000 employees. Out of that number of employees we know from what has happened in the past that approximately 4,000 will be killed every year. We know that 160,000, or approximately that number, will be injured in one way or another every year.

This vast sum of money to which I have called attention, $10,500,000, under the existing system is not distributed to all the men who are injured and to the dependents of all the men who are killed, but it goes to that portion of them who are able to maintain an action in court or who are able to obtain settlement with the railroad companies without resorting to the courts.

So, Mr. President, the result is that a portion of the men who are injured and the dependents of those who are killed get this sum of money which is paid by the railroad company, while a portion of them get nothing at all. As nearly as we could estimate it about 50 per cent of those who sustain injury or are killed are unable to recover anything at all, and about 50 per cent are able to recover something. Some of them get large judgments; some of them get wholly inadequate judgments; and 50 per cent of them get nothing at all.

But that is not the end of the story. Of this $10,500,000, approximately one-half is wasted in the process of going from the treasury of the railroad companies to the pockets of the employees, the most of which goes into the pockets of personal-injury lawyers. Therefore, under that situation, while $10,500,000 starts on its way toward these men, not to exceed $5,500,000 ever reaches their pockets.

Under this bill as amended by the House $19,000,000 will be paid to these men, and it will be paid practically automatically. I venture to say that according to the English experience not to exceed 2 per cent, or perhaps 1 per cent, of these cases will be litigated; that 98 or 99 per cent of the injured will receive their compensation automatically. I base that upon the experience of the English people under this same sort of law. The recent reports show that less than 1 per cent of the injured in England are compelled to resort to the courts. That is the statement made by the commission in England which made a thorough investigation of the subject and have accurate figures, and there can be no doubt about it at all.

The whole question is whether it is better that for this whole class of people nearly $19,000,000 should be paid for these various injuries and deaths or whether they should continue to receive $5,500,000.

The underlying philosophy of this kind of legislation can be summed up in a single sentence. The question is whether it is better that everybody injured should receive something or only that some of those injured should receive something. Under the existing law only some of those who are injured can receive something, and under this law everybody who is injured can receive something. If we agree that that principle is wise, then the only question is upon the details of the bill.

It seems to me perfectly apparent that the distribution of nearly $19,000,000 to all these people is better than the distribution of $5,500,000 to some of them.

Another of the amendments which the House proposes is to reduce the so-called waiting period from two weeks to five days. I am frank to say that I think that is an unfortunate amendment. I think it is better to have the two weeks' waiting period. I think it is better for the men themselves that that should be so, because theoretically you have this great fund of eighteen or nineteen million dollars. Theoretically, if you increase the compensation so that there is a larger fund, still you have a fund of twenty, twenty-five, or thirty million dollars to distribute among this class of employees.

Now, to the extent that you deplete the fund for the purpose of paying for trivial injuries, just to that extent you must take from those who have sustained very grave injuries. So it has always seemed to me it was better to have a two weeks' waiting period during which trivial injuries would not be compensated, in order that we might keep more money in the fund to pay for the more serious injuries.

There are a number of other amendments, but I am not going to stop now to discuss them. One amendment which has been criticized upon the floor to some extent is the one which undertakes to give concurrent jurisdiction to the State courts, and a provision in that amendment is that if the employer removes the cause, such removal shall be to the county where the cause for action arose or where the employer resides. It has been insisted that that ought not to be so; that it ought not to be removed out of the county where the employee resides, and I quite agree to that. The trouble about it is that the word "employer" is a typographical error; it was written in the bill "employee," and upon the floor of the House the same provision——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not a typographical error. It was written "employer" all the way through.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is written sometimes "employer" and sometimes "employee"; but in this particular instance it was intended to cover the "employee."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not a typographical error though.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is a slip of the pen or a typographical error, one or the other, because the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House in charge of the bill, after it had passed the House, rose and stated that fact, that the word "employer" occurred twice when it should be "employee."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but he did not claim that it was a typographical error; it was just a mistake.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It makes no difference whether it was a typographical error or a slip of the pen.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It passed the House "employer."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand that perfectly, and it would not have passed the House if the enemies of the bill had permitted that obvious mistake to be corrected.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How is it obvious?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I can not yield; I want to state this proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All right; go on.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The chairman in charge of the bill in the House asked permission for the Clerk to correct the word "employer" to "employee," stating that it was a mistake. I care not whether you call it a typographical error, a slip of the pen, or anything else; it was intended to be "employee," and a Member of the House objected to that obvious mistake being corrected. Now, it should be "employee," and everybody agrees it should be "employee." Yet if we should amend it in the Senate, it means it must go back to the House and the bill is dead.

So I have moved to concur in all these amendments in spite of the fact of the misuse of this word; but if it goes into the bill there is not the slightest doubt that before the act will become operative, which is not until the 1st of July, we can pass a resolution which will correct it. Besides that, the section in which it occurs does not go into operation until the State legislatures have acted upon it, which gives still further time to correct it.

As I said in the beginning, I am not wholly satisfied with every one of these amendments, but I feel that this is a great humanitarian measure. I believe the principle of it is sound. I do not for one moment expect that when a law of this character is first adopted it will be perfect. It will require amendment from time to time, but I would rather see this vital principle established by passing this bill, even though there may be some provisions in it that I am not wholly satisfied with, because after the bill goes into operation we will discover whatever weaknesses there may be in it and they can be corrected; but that the underlying principle of the legislation is sound I have not the slightest doubt. Therefore, Mr. President, I hope the motion will be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator, before he takes his seat, if I am right in understanding that if he is advised Senators who oppose this bill in its present shape wish to discuss the 98 amendments fully, and do not think they have time to do so during the remaining hours of the present session, that statement being given him fully and frankly, he will not undertake to continue to press this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, much as my heart is in this legislation, and important as I believe it to be to the railroad employees of this country, I recognize the absolute futility in the remaining hours of this session of undertaking to press it if there is a determined purpose upon the part of certain Senators upon that side of the Chamber to discuss it to an extent that will prevent a vote before 12 o'clock to-morrow. If that is the situation upon the other side of the Chamber, I shall not undertake to press it, but shall let the responsibility for the failure of the legislation rest upon those Senators on that side of the Chamber and not upon ours.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I differ with the Senator as to the figures he has presented with regard to payment by railroad companies for injuries to employees. I do not accept his figures as to the distribution of the money recovered under the law which now fixes the rights of railroad employees. I think his statistics are drawn from conditions existing before the operation of the present employers' liability act.

It is my purpose to discuss these amendments and to take all the time that is necessary to do so. I am willing to take the responsibility of saying that I do not think either I or those who intend to join with me in the discussion can finish by 12 o'clock to-morrow. I say frankly and fully I do not believe the bill can possibly be disposed of by 12 o'clock to-morrow, and I am willing to take all responsibility for the statement.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I desire to say individually that I greatly regret that action can not be had upon this bill. I have been for many years strongly in favor of this employees' compensation act. While the bill which was introduced here and passed some months ago was not entirely satisfactory to me, I voted for it because I regarded it as a very decided step in the direction of a most satisfactory conclusion of this question. I think that the workmen's compensation act ought to take the place of the present brutal method of procedure.

BRIDGE ACROSS TWELVEMILE BAYOU, LA.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce without amendment the bill (H. R. 28632) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Twelvemile Bayou, in Caddo Parish, La. (S. Rept. 1338.)

Mr. THORNTON. I should like to ask unanimous consent for the passage of this bill. It is a purely local measure, but of great importance to the people in the community.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am constrained to ask that the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information. The Chair was about to announce that the bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives further insisting upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26680) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and asking a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a further conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. WETMORE, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order already made by the Senate the Senate will stand at recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The Senate thereupon (at 6 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m. on the expiration of the recess.

RECLASSIFICATION OF RAILWAY POSTAL CLERKS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I present a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of Wyoming, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Wyoming, ss:

I, Frank L. Houx, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the following and hereto-attached copy of enrolled joint resolution No. 4, senate, State of Wyoming, has been carefully compared with the original, filed in this office on the 26th day of February, A. D. 1913, and is a full, true, and correct copy of the same and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 26th day of February, A. D. 1913.

[SEAL.] FRANK L. HOUX,
Secretary of State.
By F. H. WESCOTT,
Deputy.

Enrolled joint resolution 4, Senate, Twelfth Legislature of the State of Wyoming.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Wyoming (the Senate concurring), That—

Whereas the Congress of the United States enacted as a law bill No. 21,279, section 7 of which bill relates to a reclassification of the railway postal clerks and a raise in salary of the same; and

Whereas it was the manifest intention of Congress that said reclassification should apply to all railway postal clerks; and

Whereas the interpretation of this law by the Postmaster General has been such as to cause great delay and discrimination in making reclassification and adjustment of salary; and

Whereas over 35 per cent of the railway postal clerks in the Wyoming district have received no benefit under this reclassification: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, That the Senators from Wyoming in the Congress of the United States, viz, Hon. CLARENCE D. CLARK and Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN, and our Representative in said Congress, Hon. FRANK W. MONDELL, be requested to use their best efforts to secure, through the Post Office Department, a speedy reclassification and adjustment of the salary of the railway postal clerks in the Wyoming division; and be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this resolution and request be sent to the Senators from Wyoming in the Congress of the United States and our Representative in said Congress, asking them to use their best efforts upon request embodied herein.

BIRNEY H. SAGE,
President of the Senate.
MARTIN L. PRATT,
Speaker of the House.

Approved February 26, 1913, at 12.35 p. m.
JOSEPH M. CAREY, Governor.

THE DISTRICT GOVERNMENT (S. DOC. NO. 1138).

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I present a memorial from the District of Columbia Suffrage League for the appointment of a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives to consider the present form of government existing in the District of Columbia. I ask that the memorial be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS TO EMPLOYEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 5382, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5382) to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for injuries, resulting in disability or death, to employees of common carriers by railroads engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Utah does not desire further to press this bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Georgia and the statements of other Senators upon the other side that continuance of the consideration of this bill simply means a continued discussion until the end of the session, I do not feel warranted in holding it before the Senate. I regret it more than I can say, and if I believed that it was within the range of possibility to have these amendments adopted, by sitting here all night and until the end of the session, I would cheerfully do it; but I am quite convinced that it would be a useless performance and therefore I shall not insist upon the matter being further considered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be laid aside.

INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM, RECALL, ETC.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not know that my request is entirely within the rules, but I should like a moment of time within which to submit the same. I hold in my hand a message to the Legislature of the State of Arizona, by Hon. George W. P. Hunt, governor of Arizona, who discusses the initiative, the referendum, the recall, and various other reform measures. I ask, not that the same be printed as a Senate document, but that certain excerpts from it be printed in the RECORD, and I am certain that Congress will be pleased to see the advancement Arizona is making.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say that, of course, it will be impossible to have the illustrations printed.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish them printed.

Mr. SMOOT. They are not marked out in the document, but I suggest that they be taken out.

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona asks unanimous consent that certain excerpts from the message of the governor of Arizona, excepting the illustrations, be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The excerpts referred to are as follows:

MESSAGE OF GOV. GEORGE W. P. HUNT.

To the people of Arizona and members of the senate and house of representatives of the first State legislature.

Not entirely because it is a direction of law, nor yet because it is custom, but because, more than law and custom, it is essential to a complete and clear understanding between legislator and executive, and between these sworn representatives of two branches of government and the people, whose commissions they hold, I submit this statement of the State's condition, and this account of my stewardship to date.

No less to the people, who under our advanced and enlightened form of government, constitute the foundation stone of legislative authority, than to the legislators themselves, whose duty it is to accurately reflect the ideas and ideals, the aims and ambitions of Arizona's splendid citizenry, I present for such legislative consideration and action as may seem wise, and for indorsement or rejection by the electorate, my estimate of the Commonwealth's needs and my conception of the ideals that inspire, the aims that urge, the expectations that animate the citizens of our State, giving life to their patriotism, definite purpose to their efforts, soundness and substantiality to the progressivism for which they are distinguished throughout the Nation.

In every statement I shall strive for accuracy, fairness, and impartiality, for by no other means may the record be made of value. In every allegation concerning my stewardship or the actions of those who have served with me, no thought of false coloring or praise-seeking wording shall enter, for I wish my administration to be known, now and hereafter, of its real achievements, if achievements there have been; of its failures, great or small, if failure be set against the reckoning. In the presentation of my views touching the future needs of the State there shall be no straining after surface applause or studied effort to tickle the popular fancy, but an honest, straightforward exposition, as I see them, of existing defects in government, and frank and fearless suggestion of practical, concinnated legislative remedy. In the interpretation I shall essay of the signs which illumine the political sky there shall be no attempt at spectacularity, but a simple endeavor to read aright the unusual interest which distinguishes the discussion and the unwonted activity which in this day marks the ballot-box settlement of questions and issues affecting the public weal.

In its final analysis this interpretation will amount to a voicing of my conviction that the people, not alone of Arizona, nor of the United States, but of the world, are by a common need unconsciously and unpremedialely combining in a determined struggle for political emancipation; in an inspired and irresistible effort to reach the shining goal which should be the real aim of all human government—the attainment of the highest quality of human happiness.

That my interpretation, being the work of one whose sympathies are definite and fixed, may be appraised neither above nor below its worth, it must include a reaffirmation of my steadfast belief in and adherence to those principles of progressive popular rule forming the warp and woof of the people's striving toward a high governmental ideal, and declaration of my continuing pride, in which all true Arizonans will join, that this world-wide movement toward release from political thralldom, toward freedom from class inequality and governmental oppression, finds its truest expression in Arizona's constitution and was given its greatest impetus by the promulgation of that now historic document.

They who do not believe that the old order of affairs political is passing, never to return, are deceiving themselves. They who do not realize that true progress, in the adjustment and administration of government, is on its righteous, resistless way, are blind to a truth evident on every hand. They have not kept themselves informed or their senses are dulled by the poison of selfishness to the ever-increasing demands of humanity. While they sleep the world is moving, and the brotherhood of man, growing apace, is claiming its adherents, as well as from all classes and creeds and peoples, from all political parties.

Recent political events of national magnitude and world-wide importance clearly prove the people's awakening to their necessities, their duties and responsibilities. The overwhelming triumph of militant progressive Democracy and the simultaneous springing into prominent existence of another great party, founded upon and professing the championship of those cardinal principles of popular government which have long been synonymous with progressive Democracy, discloses a miraculous growth of progressive conviction, a well-nigh unanimous determination on the part of the people to assume full control of the Government which, while over them, is rightfully of and for them, and marks a leading epoch in the history of the world's advancement.

In this connection, and without desire or intent to reduce to a partisan plane this message, which I venture to hope will claim the approval of all patriotic, public-spirited, broad-minded Arizona citizens, I do not deem it inappropriate to heartily congratulate the Nation upon the elevation of Gov. Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, to be its Chief Executive. Neither do I deem it inappropriate to predict, with confidence and enthusiasm, that the honest, fearless, and effective course which has marked his conduct of the office of governor, enabling him and the principles of which he has proved so distinguished a champion to triumph over the corrupt influences and nefarious schemes of long and powerfully intrenched interests, will characterize his discharge of the exalted duties to which he has been called. Imbued with zeal for the common welfare, strong in the faith of a righteous cause, armed with the knowledge of a Nation's confidence, President Wilson will prove a true progressive leader of the world's most progressive power and justify the hopes of the great and growing army enlisted under liberty's star-spangled banner.

I congratulate Arizona that she had her part, and splendidly played it, in the selection of this genuine statesman to be the head of freedom's host, and chance the prophecy, if either chance or prophecy may be employed in a connection so fraught with certainty, that the strength of his administration and the power of his personal influence will be, not unfairly or illegitimately, but freely and frankly, used in encouragement of the efforts of those who would keep our State in the front rank she now occupies of progressive Commonwealths and in furtherance of the cause in the battle for which she has performed most conspicuous service.

And in my capacity as chief executive of Arizona, in the name of all her people who believe in the overthrowing of predatory wealth from a position of political dominance, I rejoice at the Baltimore triumph of that great champion of human rights, William Jennings Bryan, and glory in the success of his efforts, almost unaided but for the undying sympathy of the country's masses, to drive the money changers from Democracy's temple. On the roll of America's illustrious patriots none will find higher place in the years to come than the name of the man who by his almost superhuman strength and unselfish devotion to principle preserved a great political party and redeemed an endangered Nation; no record in war or peace, in commerce or invention, will shed a brighter glow over the history of his country's fame than this thrilling story of a battle gloriously won against overwhelming odds.

CONDITION OF THE STATE.

It affords me unlimited satisfaction to report that the condition of the State is most excellent. Generally speaking, the people are prosperous and happy, business is good, a fine feeling prevails, the industries upon which the State's development must largely depend are without exception flourishing, and the future holds bounteously of encouragement and promise.

While it would be frivolous persiflage to say that since Arizona's admission to statehood her cerulcated skies have grown bluer, her invigorating and life-giving air more intoxicating, or her majestic mountains, limned against the endless curtain of an azure sea, and her broad valleys stretching and spreading between, have added to their indescribable charm, it is only truth, and that inevitable, that statehood has gone far toward bringing to the attention of a Nation's restless and changing populace the delights of our matchless clime, the wealth of health that breathes in its salubrious atmosphere, the beauties of generous nature that speak from its deserts and chasms and towering pine-clad hills.

While it were idle to say that admission to the Union gave increase to the varied riches of gold and copper and what-not hidden in Arizona's treasure vaults, added fertility to her soil or fecundity to the joining of her land and water, made her grasses more succulent or her fruits more luscious, there is only fact, and confirmation of a prophecy as old as the Arizona cry for freedom from Territorial bondage, in the statement that with the realization of that hope so long deferred the development of all those native resources, lavishly bestowed upon a favored land, gained sudden and decided impetus, and the industries so brought into life are fast passing out of their nascency. The State's population is growing apace, in recognition of the truly marvelous advantages it offers; capital is being attracted, not by means of tempting legislative baits, but by the show of wonderful and legitimate opportunity; seekers of homes and searchers after health and rest and recreation are turning to the newly-risen star as to the glories of a promised land; fields are widening, herds are multiplying, smokestacks increasing; settlements and towns are springing up here and there and everywhere. The people are alert, buoyant, hopeful, and energetic. Progress, industrial, social, and political is in the air.

LABOR AND CAPITAL.

The conditions which too frequently cause serious differences between labor and capital, occasioning economic loss and individual suffering, have been reduced to a minimum in Arizona, thanks to wise and salutary laws, and what is of still greater importance and effect, a general desire on the part of both classes to treat with fairness and liberality the other. Not yet to a proper degree, but so plainly aiming that way as to be conducive of a great measure of contentment, labor has been recognized by Arizona law and placed upon a dignified if not exalted plane. Its rights, more than ever before, are safeguarded by statute, and instead of occupying the humble and humiliating position to which it has in the past been all too subject, that of slave or servant to capital's unreasoning exactions, it has been enabled to assume a place of full and acknowledged partnership in the great work of industrial State building; and out of the treadmill of impossible and inhuman hours, which was its lot, it has been accorded those opportunities for social and mental betterment which are essential to the production of virile, vigorous, capable, patriotic citizens.

It has been found also that the constitutional abrogation of the archaic fellow-servant doctrine and the doctrine of contributory negligence, as well as the prohibition against the assumption of risk by workmen engaged in hazardous occupations, has worked very greatly to the advantage of many employees and established a more equitable basis for the settlement of disputes arising between them and the corporations in whose service they may have been injured.

As yet the workmen's compulsory compensation law, enacted at the first special session of the first State legislature, can not be said to have demonstrated either its success or failure. Not effective until September 1, 1912, there has been little time or opportunity to determine its merit or lack thereof. It may not be amiss, however, to state that there is an extended and apparently well-fixed belief that the law will prove inefficient, if not indeed unconstitutional, and therefore inoperative. Despite this I would not suggest any changes at the present time, believing that the existing law, in the absence of data other than that upon which it was based, or definite information as to its workings, should be given a trial.

In the meantime thought and study might be profitably given to the subject of State insurance for workingmen, the losses to be paid out of a fund provided by the companies employing men in hazardous occupations. Such a law is being tried in some States, and it may be found to work out satisfactorily.

MINIMUM WAGE SCALE.

A law providing a minimum scale of wages for workmen constitutes a reasonable demand being made by the best class of labor, and I hope to see such a law, drafted along fair and equitable lines, enacted. It will accrue alike to the benefit of competent, industrious, and honest employees and of legitimate, fair-minded employers.

VINDICATION OF DIRECT LEGISLATION.

It should afford gratification to the members of the legislature and satisfaction to the public, as it does in very great degree to myself, that with few exceptions the laws enacted by the first State legislature have, in the short trial they have had, proved wise, wholesome, and effective. The few exceptions coming under my observation will be treated hereafter by specific recommendations.

Of particular and extraordinary interest at this time is the splendid and convincing vindication of the principle and as well the practice of direct legislation as embodied in the Arizona constitution, a vindication afforded not only by the results of the election held November 5, but also by other occurrences of recent months. Notable among these may be mentioned the somewhat curious fact that whereas during the period in which the framing of Arizona's constitution was an issue the Democratic Party was forced to make a single-handed fight for the direct-legislation cause, so well established has this principle now become that during the last campaign every political party, young or old, represented in the State, made platform indorsement of the initiative and referendum.

The legislature submitted to the people four proposed amendments to the constitution, while the people, taking advantage of the power reserved to them under the constitution, initiated an amendment to the suffrage and elections article, providing for woman suffrage. All of these proposed amendments were of the greatest importance and elicited the interest they deserved. The vote on them was as follows:

Recall of judicial officers: For, 16,272; against, 3,705.

Right of State to engage in industrial pursuits: For, 14,928; against, 3,602.

Permitting greater latitude in the enactment of taxation laws: For, 15,967; against, 2,283.

Permitting the additional bonding of incorporated towns and cities for municipal water and light plants and sewers: For, 15,358; against, 2,676.

Equal suffrage: For, 13,442; against, 6,202.

In addition to these constitutional amendments, the referendum was invoked on eight measures enacted by the legislature. It is worthy of consideration, in estimating the absolute fairness and practicability of this method of legislation, that in all of these cases save two resort to the people, which should always be the court of final appeal, was had by and at the instance of corporations which were, while Arizona's constitution was being framed and during the period when its fate, with that of statehood, hung in the balance at Washington, in bitter opposition to the initiative and referendum features of the charter. Not only were these corporations first to invoke the referendum, but they took occasion, in the literature forming a part of an elaborate campaign made to defeat the measures to which objection was had, to commend the "wise provision" of the constitution permitting the people to pass judgment on all laws enacted by the legislature.

Never could the interest of the people in legislation affecting their welfare, or the welfare of any class of citizens, or their ability to judge of the merits or demerits of proposed measures, be more strikingly illustrated or more definitely settled, than was done in this instance. On one hand, certain powerful interests violently objecting to the measures enacted by the legislature, after invoking the referendum, entered upon an elaborate, exhaustive, systematic, and doubtless very expensive campaign to defeat the measures at the polls. Speakers were employed to tour the State; printed literature in large quantities, and personal letters, signed by prominent and influential officers of the corporations chiefly concerned, flooded the mails; personal workers were interested, and such employees as could be influenced were advised as to what was "for the best interests of the company," while great spaces were used in many newspapers in the State, not only in the advertising columns, but in the news columns, and very frequently in the editorial departments. On the other hand, the advocates of the measures had no newspaper representation whatever. If the newspapers of the State were not influenced by the splendid advertising patronage they were receiving from the corporations, they were certainly indifferent to the subject, for no word came from them in support of the referred measures. Nor did any political party champion the cause or lend its moral support. As required by law, publicity pamphlets were sent out by the secretary of state; a few speeches were made in the larger towns by advocates representing the labor organizations; and the people, alive to every phase of the situation, discussed it among themselves. That was the extent of the affirmative campaign. And in spite of the efforts put forth to convince them to the contrary, the people decided, by the following vote, that the measures were good ones:

Full train crew bill: For, 11,123; against, 7,635.

Requiring electric headlights on locomotives: For, 11,286; against, 7,408.

Requiring three years' service as fireman to become locomotive engineer: For, 10,921; against, 7,956.

Limiting number of cars in a freight train to 70: For, 10,709; against, 8,228.

Three-cent passenger fare bill: For, 14,823 against, 4,835.

Other measures on which the referendum was invoked, and the vote by which they were sustained, were as follows:

Creating miner's labor lien on mines and mining claims: For, 13,551; against, 5,804.

Protection of wild game: For, 13,121; against, 6,334.

The favorite claim made by the opponents of direct legislation that the people will not take an interest in measures referred to or initiated by them, is here totally disproved, since an average of 18,887 votes were cast on the constitutional amendments and 17,884 on the referred laws, as against an average vote of 23,483 for presidential electors and 23,545 for all candidates for Congress.

It were difficult to conceive of a more emphatic demonstration of the thorough utility of Arizona's direct-legislation provision than has thus been afforded at its first trial. Nor can this demonstration be in anywise affected by the technical objections raised in the courts by the corporations after they failed in their efforts with the people. If the courts should declare that errors, unavoidable by reason of considerations of time, were made in submitting the referred measures, it will merely be necessary for the legislature to reenact them, and, in my opinion, it will be the legislature's duty and privilege, under such circumstances, to pass them with the emergency clause attached, since they have already received the people's approval.

EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

Arizona is now one of the States in which equal suffrage has become an accomplished fact—in which mothers and wives and sisters are accorded a voice equal to that of the fathers, husbands, and brothers in the affairs of state. That the extension of the privilege of suffrage to women was an act of the commonest justice is my firm conviction, and I am possessed of the most perfect confidence that it will redound to the State's great benefit. Therefore, while I congratulate the women of Arizona upon the successful termination—and no other sort of a termination would ever have been a termination—of their struggle for the ballot, I congratulate Arizona more that it is to receive the benefit not only of their splendid influence, as insured by the high average of feminine ideals, but as well of its direct reflection at the polls and in the ballot box.

In considering the means by which this result was brought about, full credit must ever be given to the framers of the Arizona constitution, for to their determination, in the face of every obstacle, of which there were many and serious, to erect a government of, for, and by the people, is attributable the machinery known as the initiative and referendum, whereby a free and honest expression on any subject may be obtained and crystallized into law. The Democratic Party of Arizona may well be proud of this achievement, which is but an instance, though a notable one, of its practical championship of sound progressive principles.

It were needless for me to commend to the "better half" of Arizona's electorate the approaching of their new duties in the utmost seriousness. Their obligation is a sacred one. Of this fact I feel entire confidence that they possess a full realization and that they will, by the use of the ballot, amply warrant their own hopes and aspirations while justifying the faith of those who have labored for their recognition.

RECALL OF JUDGES.

As was anticipated, the people, by an overwhelming majority, replaced in the constitution, from which it was taken by order of President Taft as a condition precedent to statehood, the provision for the recall of judicial officers who may prove recreant to their trust. Thus is the State's right to a constitution of its own making vindicated, its legitimate independence of executive interference asserted, and the consistent belief of the people in their ability to govern themselves established. I am more than ever a firm believer in the admonitory value of the recall and continue to entertain the opinion that it should apply, as it now does in Arizona, to all elective officers.

EXPENSE OF GOVERNMENT.

Of the criticisms offered and complaints which I have heard directed against the present legislature and the present administration none have appeared to me as worthy of the same serious consideration or have occasioned, so far as I am concerned, the same serious thought as that one which is based upon the increased cost of maintaining the State government and the consequent necessity for raising an increased amount of revenue by taxation. It is a subject of vital importance to every taxpayer and to every well-meaning citizen ambitious to become a taxpayer. It should be discussed freely and frankly, the facts set forth accurately and understandingly, and the truth, always essential to the correct solution of a problem, arrived at.

I regret to say that this is not the attitude assumed by a number of newspapers in the State, which, apparently without the faintest conception of a higher mission than blind partisanship, without the remotest thought of fair play or a square deal, or yet a desire or care to learn the truth, much less to publish it, have persistently charged extravagance, misappropriation and misapplication of funds, general inefficiency, and what not. It shall be my pleasure, as it is my duty, to set forth the facts as they exist, and, despite the bitter and ridiculous accusations of antagonistic partisan newspapers, whose chief stock in trade is vituperation and falsehood, I shall hope to convince all reasonable, fair-minded citizens of the State that whatever expenses have been incurred in the management of their business were for the advancement of their interests, and whatever expenditures have been made were necessary to the proper carrying out of their instructions and of the law.

If a comprehensive discussion of this subject occupies considerable space, it will be justified on the ground of its importance to the taxpayers and the desire which I am sure must exist on the part of the public to be reliably informed regarding their business and regarding the acts of their servants.

At the outset the "defense," to employ a legal phrase, readily admits that it has cost more to maintain the State government than it cost to maintain a Territorial government. That this would be the case was absolutely inevitable, as no one will have the hardihood to deny; and still few, if any, taxpayers in the State, realizing that it would be so, were deterred by the prospect of a slight additional expense from desiring the blessings of statehood. The question, therefore, is not whether more money has been spent than formerly, but whether the various items of such additional expense are legitimate, whether the laws causing such items are wise, and whether they have been economically administered in strict accordance with their various provisions. I shall attempt to elucidate and illumine the situation sufficiently for any seeker after the truth, and will support my various statements by figures. While it may be impossible, in some cases, to make these figures absolutely accurate, they can always be relied upon to be approximately so.

Concerning the laws themselves, no criticisms entitled to notice have come to my ears. To be sure, the general and foundationless assertion has been made by either ignorant or willfully mendacious—and usually the latter—journals and individuals that the legislature created useless offices on a wholesale scale, but this requires almost no refutation. A bare list of the offices created is sufficient to convincingly suggest the need of each, and a perusal of the constitution, which had the people's overwhelming approval, will show that with three exceptions, two of which are exceedingly minor, provision for the offices created was made absolutely mandatory. The appropriations for the conduct of these offices, as I will show by an itemized statement thereof, were kept at the lowest possible point, and in some cases, as experience has demonstrated, were placed too low.

Aside from the offices "created"—that is, offices which did not exist under the Territorial government—the expense of salaries and the maintenance of numerous regular State offices, such as the governor, the secretary of state, and the courts, paid prior to statehood by the Federal Government, has fallen upon the taxpayers of the new State. This is also true of the legislature, the cost of which is necessarily considerable. Add to these unavoidable expenses the equally unavoidable one of making many alterations in the capitol, to provide accommodations for the new officers and the supreme court, and the likewise unavoidable one of employing the additional clerical help required to transact a materially enhanced business in every department, and the situation begins to unfold.

It does not become entirely clear, however, until it is understood that when the present administration took charge of the State's business it discovered a deficit in the general fund, out of which all the ordinary expenses of government are met, of approximately $150,000. This circumstance I alluded to in my first message to the legislature, and it is quite as true now as then. The deficiency was caused by the failure of the last Territorial board of equalization to levy a sufficient tax to keep the general fund in its normal condition, the lowering of the tax levy at what was, from a business standpoint, a most inopportune time—since conditions really demanded an increased levy—being obviously done for political considerations. This deficiency had to be met by the taxpayers of the State and is very largely explanatory of the necessity for increased revenues.

The amount of such increased revenue is not difficult to ascertain, nor the purposes, which I have already roughly outlined, to which it was devoted.

In 1911, the last year under Territorial government, the total assessment of property for Territorial purposes was $98,032,708.64. In 1912 this was increased to $140,338,191.08. The tax levy in both years was 90 cents on each $100 worth of property. Anyone may, therefore, easily determine that under the assessment and tax levy of 1912 increased revenue was raised, assuming that all taxes have been or will be paid, to the amount of $380,749.38.

The question is reduced to this concrete proposition: What has been done with that money, and were the purposes for which it was and is being spent legitimate? To the latter part of the proposition I answer, emphatically, yes, and the former part will be replied to with quite definite figures.

Since no expense is or may be incurred without warrant of law, we will look to the law for the facts. The first State legislature enacted laws, which met my approval, involving specific appropriations of a distinctly extraordinary class—that is, differing from and in addition to the appropriations other legislatures had been called upon to make—of more than a quarter of a million dollars, and in order that the taxpayers may judge of the wisdom or unwisdom, the necessity or lack of necessity, of making these appropriations the following statement is appended:

Offices created by the constitution.
Salaries and expense of maintaining supreme court	$33,435.06
Salaries of superior judges, one-half of which are paid by the State	32,757.72
Salaries and expense of corporation commission	43,805.00
Expense of legislature	75,000.00
Salary and expense of State examiner	4,100.00
Salaries of land commission and of office assistants	11,075.00
Salary and expense of State mine inspector (about)	12,000.00
Offices created by the legislature.
Salaries and expense of the State tax commission (about)	20,000.00
Salary and expense of State sealer of weights and measures	4,000.00
Expense of maintaining office of State game warden—salary to be paid out of revenues of the office	5,000.00
Other extraordinary appropriations.
For carrying out the provisions of the initiative and referendum law	5,000.00
For carrying out the provisions of the pure-food law	4,500.00
For the education of the deaf, dumb, and blind	5,000.00
For dry-farming experiments, date-palm experiments, holding of farmers' institutes, horticultural experiments, protection of the State against alfalfa weevil and other dangerous pests, and investigating the water resources of the State	22,000.00
For canvassing the 1912 election vote	500.00
Expense of the first primary election	114.90
Total	278,287.68

Add to this total the salaries and expenses of the governor's office and of the office of secretary of state, and the cost of making many alterations in the capitol, and the legitimate necessity for practically all of the increased revenue provided for by the tax levy is explained. Then add the $150,000 deficit bequeathed to the present administration by its Territorial predecessor, and the reply to those who would complain about the tax rate becomes almost eloquent. As a matter of fact, the actual and necessary expense, in addition to and above the needs of previous administrations, incurred or to be incurred by the present administration from the date on which Arizona became a State—February 14, 1912—to the completion of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, will amount, in round figures and including the huge deficit heretofore mentioned, to $500,000. To increase this will come the expense of the present legislature and of the revision of the code, already authorized and nearly completed, except for legislative approval.

It is not claimed that the above figures are absolutely accurate as regards their extraordinary character, but they are approximately so and as accurate as it is possible to make them. A few minor amounts might be offset by somewhat similar appropriations in former years, but not to an extent which would appreciably affect the totals. In one instance—that of the corporation commission—the appropriation is partly offset by revenues of the office, but neither does this materially alter the figures offered.

A review of the items of expense above set forth will show their wisdom and necessity. Every office for which provision was made is essential to the proper administration of the people's business, most of them being the result of constitutional mandates, and it is not likely that the other extraordinary appropriations will be criticized by any fair-minded taxpayer.

I do not by any means claim perfection for the present administration. I do not claim that no money has been unwisely spent or every penny saved that might have been, but I do assert that not a dollar has been expended without authority of law, not a dollar has been squandered, no graft has been permitted, every effort has been exerted to honestly and faithfully conserve the public funds in strict accordance with my pledges of a business administration; and actual comparisons with other administrations, when they can be made, will show to the credit of the officials who are now serving the State. Much in the way of systematization has been accomplished, the institutions are being conducted better and more economically than ever before, and I feel no pangs of conscience when I assert that, while improvements are possible, no reasonable or justifiable complaint can be offered against the present conduct of the State's business.

This statement has consumed much time and space, but it may nevertheless be well, before passing the subject, to call attention to another matter. As has been heretofore stated, the tax levy for 1912 contemplates the raising by direct taxation of $380,749.38 greater revenue than in 1911. It may not be generally known that almost the entire sum of this additional burden was by the taxing authorities of the State placed on the industries best able to bear it, namely, the mining companies and the railroads. To be specific, the mining industry contributed $233,124.77 more than last year, while the railroad companies' taxes were increased by $85,141.82. Therefore, of the $380,749.38 additional revenue $318,266.59 comes from the State's wealthiest interests, leaving the comparatively insignificant sum of $62,482.79 to be borne by all other classes of property.

STATE PRISON AND THE PRISON POLICY.

In discussing the various State institutions for the maintenance of which the legislature will be called upon to provide, it is natural and logical that I should give first attention to the State prison, since the policy maintained by the superintendent and myself with regard to its management and the treatment of its inmates has during the past year been the storm center about which the administration's critics and enemies have raged. I want the public to know the exact and entire truth, which could not be secured from reading the average published accounts of what has been done or what has occurred. Based upon a full and accurate knowledge of the facts, the people's decision will occasion me no uneasiness.

As a matter of reality, as disappointing as it may be to sensation mongers, nothing sensational or yet very startling has been done or attempted. The most lurid and blood-curdling stories of alleged occurrences at the prison, and ridiculous exaggerations of "Gov. Hunt's honor system," have time and again served as headliners for newspapers whose object was not the performance of a public service, but the working of political injury and utterly foundationless fabrications by the hundreds, emanating from like antagonistic and unreliable sources, have been peddled by word of mouth. A recital of the facts, which any honest man may confirm by slight investigation, will serve to show the utter falsity of the derogatory allegations which have been handed about and at the same time disclose the animus back of them.

Summed up in a few words, the superintendent and myself have followed the lead of those progressive States whose penal institutions are being conducted on modern, advanced, humanitarian lines. As in those institutions the inmates of Arizona's prison are being treated not as brutes but as men with souls—not as hang-dog curs, in whom no hope of redemption lies, but as human beings who, having gone astray, should be led back, if possible, into the useful way and against the day when they must again take up their duties outside of prison walls equipped both with a desire and the ability to fight life's battle. This is really all there is to it except that the results, far from justifying the vindictive estimates of the honor system's enemies, have been very largely, if not entirely, satisfactory. I will not say that no errors have been made, or disappointments and rebuffs met with; such a claim would be without the bounds of truth even as such a condition would be without the bounds of reason, but I can and do say that errors have been both few and insignificant and there has been no disappointment which would justify the slightest discouragement.

The snake den, relic of a barbaric day, has been abolished; inhuman punishments, which, while breaking the spirits of men, breed the most dangerous type of confirmed criminals, have been barred; better and more food has been provided, and less humiliating, though not less disciplinary rules, adopted. The men have been led to feel that with proper behavior on their part the future holds hope, rather than black despair. They have been and are being given to understand that the officers in charge of them are as much their friends as their keepers—there not only to guard, but to protect and help them. On occasion prisoners have been placed on their honor and detailed to perform a service for themselves and for the State, and rarely have they abused the confidence.

I have said that nothing sensational has been done, but I am not quite certain that the effect of this simple, sympathetic, humanitarian policy has not been sensational. Certainly it has been electrical. The men have displayed every evidence of appreciation of the treatment accorded them. Never were there so few infractions of the rules, never so few escapes or so little plotting to escape. The tense, strained feeling which generally characterizes penitentiary air is totally absent about the Arizona prison, and instead of slinking, skulking shadows, with heads lowered and averted faces, the inmates move erectly and do not fear to look in the eye those whom they meet. They feel that there is something to hope for, to live for, and to honestly, patiently strive for. Instead of being irreclaimable outcasts, serving no purpose but to burden the public while in prison and upon their release to again prey upon society, they prove in many instances to be good, sound material for the making of real men and useful citizens.

No maudlin sentimentality moved me to the establishment of this policy, but a firm conviction that the practical, sensible, systematic conservation of human beings is fully as important and fully as likely to produce profit to the State and to mankind as the elaborate, scientific conservation of the forests, the water, and the fuel of the country, or the careful protection of wild game. What little has been accomplished—and measured by past results it is not so little after all—has added to my conviction of its utility, and I do not hesitate to promise, both to the friends and enemies of the "honor system," that it shall be conscientiously continued during my incumbency of the office of governor. Nor do I fear to add that when the scurrilous falsehoods propagated by this administration's reactionary enemies shall have been lost in the scrap heap of ignominious repudiation the "honor system" of conducting penal institutions will be as generally accepted, not only in Arizona but throughout the country, as now are those well-established principles of progressive government which little more than a year ago these same enemies of progress were denouncing as radical and anarchistic.

In the estimates I have made of the results of the honor system, as applied to Arizona's penitentiary, I have not included an item which can not fail to appeal to the most unsentimental, practical mind—the saving it has been to the State in dollars and cents on the one hand and the profit it has yielded on the other. Under its operation the men serving sentences have performed with cheerfulness and a show of genuine interest the many tasks assigned them, and as a result of the policy of providing them with a good supply of wholesome, nourishing food they have been enabled to produce results that would be creditable to the very best class of free labor engaged in similar employments.

Road making and bridge construction have been satisfactorily prosecuted under an arrangement with the counties whereby the State is compensated by the difference between the cost of maintenance at prison and in camp. This has resulted in good highways, valuable both to the counties and the State, has heightened the spirits and increased the healthfulness of the men, and entirely demonstrated that the "honor system," judiciously applied, is practical. In the first camp—established in the Pinal Mountains for the construction of a road from Globe to Ray—where the "honor system" was entirely resorted to, the most striking success met the experiment. This camp, now temporarily deserted on account of weather conditions, was in the pine woods miles from any town, and every opportunity was offered for the escape of the men, had they desired to avail themselves of it. An average of 30 honor men from the prison, most of them being life men and long termers, under no guard and attended only by the foreman in charge of construction, maintained this camp for six months, worked faithfully and intelligently day after day, and when a short time ago, acting under instructions, they marched over the mountains and back to the prison, only three, two of them having less than six months to serve, had ever attempted to escape. The reward of the faithful ones was a credit of two days off of their sentences for each day served, and the consciousness, which it is evident to me they reckoned in the account, of a trust honestly discharged. They went back to prison stronger physically and morally, and for their experience, and perhaps other like experiences, will leave the penitentiary—when the day they hope for, on which they can leave it free men, arrives—imbued with the aspirations, the faith, and the courage of honest and law-abiding citizens.

The many newspaper reports of "honor men" taking French leave, with which several reactionary and falsifying papers of the State have enlivened their columns and regaled their readers, were pure and simple lies, of which these newspapers, had they cared to do so, could readily have satisfied themselves. Some escapes there have been, as there always will be, but they have been reduced to a minimum, and few indeed can be charged to the honor men. In addition to the camp described above, an honor camp—consisting almost entirely of Mexicans—was maintained during the construction of a splendid highway from Florence to Mesa, and though no guard was established at either place, the total of escapes did not exceed the average from camps where the men are held under the strictest surveillance by armed guard.

A favorite falsehood some time since given wide circulation ran to the effect that the prison guards were not allowed to carry arms, and that the convicts were permitted to pass in and out of the gates without restraint. A frightful massacre, as a result of this unheard-of condition, was being tragically predicted by men old enough, if in no other sense equipped, to know better. The truth is that under the present management the most perfect system of discipline, checking, and protection against possible accidents that the prison has ever known is and has been maintained. Fewer guards than ever before are employed, but it is because under the careful business system in vogue this is possible. As a result of this economical and efficient management the prison made a net saving during the six months ended September 30, 1912, over a similar period the previous year, of $18,466.21, a saving which will show in an increased amount when the sums due from various counties on account of road work done is taken into consideration. During this period also the provision allowance was increased by 20 per cent.

From every viewpoint, and despite the obstacles raised by mean and spiteful men who have not hesitated to employ the most outrageous falsehoods to create antagonism on the part of an uninformed public, the administration's much-maligned prison policy has proved, and is proving, an unqualified success. I am more than willing to stand or fall by the record.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

A year ago I recommended to the legislature the submission of a constitutional amendment providing for the abolishment of capital punishment. That recommendation I now repeat, and urgently request that through legislative action the people of the State be afforded an opportunity to signify their disapproval of legalized murder. Present-day enlightenment is crystallizing an extended and rapidly extending opposition to the taking of human life by any means or under any pretext; practical, modern Christianity, independent of church or creed, demands that this relic of the darkest of dark ages be relegated to the limbo of the past; students of psychology, sociology, and penology, supported by records no less than by theory and reason, are a unit in agreeing that its practice serves no good purpose, acting neither as a preventative nor a deterrent of crime; the march of humanity forbids its perpetuation even as it forbids the medieval custom of throwing prisoners to wild beasts to make a holiday, and common sense teaches that the legalizing of its horrors must lower rather than raise the moral conceptions and standards of a people, and breed contempt rather than respect for a law which violates every merciful instinct and gives the lie to God's Sinaitic command, "Thou shalt not kill."

While this blot remains on her statutes the progressiveness Arizona boasts is defective and weak and halting, and I therefore urge that it be removed at the earliest possible moment.

PUBLISHING NAMES OF STOCKHOLDERS.

I wish to renew my recommendation, made to the legislature a year ago, that newspapers be required to publish the names of their owners and stockholders. In this day, when momentous questions are being daily discussed, and such questions frequently involve the rights and interests of the masses as distinguished from the desires and aims of a selfish few, it is meet and proper that newspaper readers should know whose arguments they are reading and whose views they are digesting. Congress has established a precedent for such a law, by imposing certain postal regulations. This should be strengthened by a stringent State law, to which no honest, sincere, and uncollared editor should or will object. The untrammeled press will thus be dignified, and the organs of the interests at least have the satisfaction of sailing under their true colors.

LEGISLATIVE RESEARCH.

Much to my regret a bill for the establishment of a department of legislative research, or a reference library on legislative subjects, was defeated at the last session. The need for and the wisdom of such a department should be apparent to every thoughtful man, and I express the hope that at this session of the legislature the subject will receive favorable consideration. It will not be an expense, but an economy, in that it will save the time of the legislators, provide them with a fund of information they can not otherwise acquire, make for better, more workable, and more uniform laws, prevent conflicts and repetitions, and keep the State in the forefront of progressive legislation.

ANTILOBBYING.

And I again call attention to the fact that the enactment of an antilobbying law is a constitutional mandate. To be sure, this particular mandate might not, in the opinion of the legislature, be a wise one, or compliance with it might be deferred 10 years or indefinitely, but I do not believe that was the view held by or the intent of the constitutional convention, or the people who ratified the constitution, and I therefore urge that one of the first acts of the legislature be the fulfillment of this obligation. It is idle to make answer to the arguments offered in certain quarters against an antilobbying law, for there are no arguments worthy of consideration. It is merely a measure designed to prevent secret-service agents and "gum-shoe" tools of special interests from plying their nefarious trade during sessions of the legislature, and to permit legitimate representatives, by declaring their purpose or employment, to appear in a dignified way before the people's lawmaking body.

* * * * * * *

To this and to all other matters coming before the legislature I trust the most conscientious patriotic consideration will be given, without thought of personal sensitiveness or selfishness, or sectional, partisan, or factional interest; without thought of injury to any, but a worthy desire for the good of all. Arizona is in the front rank of progressive commonwealths—a position won by the intelligence, the courage and determination of her people. It is the duty of every true Arizonian, citizen, legislator, officer, and executive, by the exercise of the best qualities of heart and mind, and if need be, by sacrifices of the body, to keep her there. It is a duty we owe, not only to the State we call our own, but to the cause of progress, whose signal fires are lit on every hilltop, whose banners fly in every breeze; and pledging my own, I bespeak the cooperation of all.

Respectfully,

GEO. W. P. HUNT,
Governor of Arizona.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to call up House joint resolution No. 402, and I ask the attention of the Senators from New York to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill may now be taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26874) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have yielded to Senators who have requested me to do so, and I desire to continue that policy with this exception: I understand there is a general agreement that we shall go into executive session at 9 o'clock. Prior to that time I prefer to continue my remarks without interruption. After we come out of executive session and I have the floor, as I presume I shall if this subject is still before the Senate, I shall continue the policy of yielding to any Senator who has a matter of great importance, with the permission, of course, of the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand, Mr. President, that the Senator from New Mexico does not want to yield any time between now and 9 o'clock?

Mr. FALL. I should prefer, unless it is a matter of very great importance, not to do so for the moment, and I understand that is also the desire of the Senator who is the chairman of this committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not wish the Senator to yield, if he does not desire to be disturbed.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, about the conclusion of my remarks when I last had the floor I had referred to the action of this Government with reference to Nicaraguan affairs and was asked a question by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] touching the conduct of this Government in Nicaragua. I have called attention to the difference in the methods pursued by the Government of the United States with reference to Mexican affairs and that pursued with reference to Nicaraguan affairs. I am aware of the fact that the answer might be made with reference to Nicaragua that this Government had sent its marines and sailors and its battleships into Nicaraguan ports, and I think very properly, for the purpose of preserving the lives and property of American citizens, defending the American embassy, and, incidentally, keeping open communication from the seaports to the city of Managua and other inland towns. The answer might be made, of course, to the suggestion as to why this Government had treated the two nations differently, that in Nicaragua our marines and sailors had been placed there with the consent of the Nicaraguan Government. In answer to that proposition, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact—an historical fact, well known—that the present Government of Nicaragua is a revolutionary government, recognized, and, as a great many people believe, placed in power because of the action of the Government of the United States in ousting, first Zelaya as President, and, second, in refusing to recognize the government of Madriz, his successor.

I have understood that the present Government of Nicaragua is a government constituted and maintained by the Government of the United States. Therefore, if it is attempted to be advanced here as a reason for placing the marines and the sailors of the United States in Nicaragua that they were so placed with the consent of the Nicaraguan Government, the answer to that, Mr. President, is that the consent of the Nicaraguan Government was the consent of a puppet of the United States.

Mr. President, I referred in my remarks a short time since to the action of the American forces along the border of Mexico, on the southern boundary of Arizona, of New Mexico, and of Texas. I made the statement that the American armed forces placed upon that border were being used for the arrest of American citizens in American cities, where there was no state of warfare, in times of peace, contrary to the direct provisions of the Constitution of the United States. American citizens have been fired upon and killed in Agua Prieta, across the line from Douglas, Ariz.; American citizens have been killed at El Paso, Tex., on the American side of the line; American troops have been and were at that time guarding the boundary. Orders were issued to the Mexicans and communicated by officers of the United States Army to the Mexicans that they should not fire across the border. In the face of such orders American citizens were killed, with our soldiers present, and no successful attempt was made to prevent those attacks upon the lives of American citizens. The Government of the United States, through its State Department, as I pointed out to the Senate in July of last year, refused even to demand of the Mexican Government damages for the wounding of American women and damages for the killing of American citizens on this side of the boundary line in the face of American troops.

I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that not until this body had passed a resolution, concurred in by the House of Representatives, was there any attempt made by any branch of the American Government to even investigate the killing of American citizens on American soil in time of peace in the United States. Then, to secure action, to secure the proper investigation, or any investigation, it became necessary for the Congress of the United States to take out of the power of the State Department any such investigation, to take out of the hands of the State Department of this Government the investigation properly belonging to it, and action upon which should have been taken without the direction of Congress.

It became necessary for the Congress of the United States to direct the Secretary of War himself, through a commission, to make an investigation into the killing, to ascertain the amount of damage done, to ascertain the amount which should be paid by the Mexican Government itself to the survivors and the wounded on this side of the border. It has become necessary at this session of Congress first to pass a law, and finally to include in an appropriation bill a provision, for the payment by this Government itself of the amount found due by that commission, appointed under the direction of this Congress, to survivors of the killed and to the wounded at El Paso and Agua Prieta. There has been no report of any kind or character except of this commission, and no demand has ever been made upon the Mexican Government, from the time of this damage until the present day, for the payment of one dollar of damages; and now, to see that justice is done to American citizens wounded and killed on American soil, it has become necessary for the American Congress to provide at this session for the payment of $71,000 for damages to its citizens at El Paso and Agua Prieta.

Before I conclude my remarks, I shall undertake to show, Mr. President, that the action of this Government has been of a weak, imbecilic character in every phase of this Mexican affair.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator has just stated that the present Congress has provided for an appropriation of some $70,000——

Mr. FALL. Seventy-one thousand dollars.

Mr. SHIVELY. With which we respond in damages to our own citizens.

Mr. FALL. The Government of the United States paying that amount out of its own Treasury; yes, sir.

Mr. SHIVELY. As a matter of fact, the primary obligation rests on the United States Government to take care of its own citizens, does it not?

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly; and anywhere, according to my position.

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes; anywhere and under any circumstances. Therefore, so far as we have gone, the step has been in the right direction, and if there is anything lacking it is because the demand has not been made on the Mexican Government. Whether we make any demand on the Mexican Government or not, we must respond in damages to our own citizens for injuries that they have suffered under such circumstances.

Mr. FALL. In answering the question of the Senator, Mr. President, I will say that, in the face of the absolute refusal of the administration to demand and secure damages from the Mexican Government, I think the Congress of the United States has done exactly what was proper in itself providing for those damages out of the National Treasury. I am not criticizing the act of Congress; I am proud that I am a Member of this Congress, which, in view of the failure of the executive department of this Government to undertake in any way to protect American citizens, has at least provided for the payment of damages to those who were injured on this side of the line when pursuing their peaceful vocations on American soil; but it should never have been necessary for this Congress to have provided for these claims out of the Treasury of the United States.

I do not care, Mr. President, to go into the precedents upon this subject; but I can say that under former Republican administrations, in dealing with such conditions in the Republic of Mexico, without hesitation the Republican Secretary of State has demanded of the Mexican Government damages, exemplary damages, for injuries done to the property and persons of American citizens within the Republic of Mexico, and not alone on this side of the border. When Minister Romero and Minister Mariscal undertook to advance the theory that the legal remedy in the local courts must first be pursued, he was answered by a true Republican Secretary of State, Mr. Hamilton Fish, that, in view of the circumstances existing in 1873 and 1874 in Mexico, which were exactly similar to the conditions that have existed for the last two years in Mexico, citizens of the United States, even those residing in Mexico, would not be relegated to the local courts of Mexico, but that, through diplomatic channels, the claims of those citizens would be insisted upon and that Mexico must pay them.

For the first time in the history of this country, I believe, where a state of absolute anarchy has existed, as it has in a contiguous country, or in a foreign country, as it has existed in Mexico for more than two years—for the first time in the history of this great Nation American citizens have been told that not only would the armed forces of the United States not be used to assist and protect them but that the State Department would make no representations in their behalf to the foreign Government, even to the extent of asking that the local tribunals take action upon their cases.

Mr. President, in the partial report of the Senate committee to which I referred in my opening remarks page after page could be read substantiating the statements which I have made here with reference to the action of the United States Army and its officers in stopping women and children upon the streets of El Paso. At five different stations in El Paso County American soldiers have been stopping and searching American citizens on American soil, not in time of war, but day in and day out for more than a year during time of peace in this country. For 12 months American citizens must ride through forces of the American Army in going from point to point in that Texas city and from points in that city to points throughout the county of El Paso on roads not leading into Mexico. The armed forces of this Government have been stationed there for the purpose of searching American citizens, women and children; and I can name the wives of State senators, of State officers in Texas, the wives and families of bankers and lawyers, the most prominent citizens in El Paso, who have been stopped every day by the soldiers of the United States Government in undertaking to traverse the streets and the roads of El Paso with their automobiles. Even the tops of the gasoline tanks in those automobiles were unscrewed, and the soldiers looked into the gasoline tanks to see whether one of these ladies was smuggling arms or ammunition to the rebels in Mexico in contravention of the proclamation of the President of the United States.

Mr. President, to my mind the people of the United States are becoming so careless of their constitutional rights or else so degenerate that I must say I have fears for the life of this Republic of ours when they will submit to indignities of this character and to violations of the constitutional provisions against search and seizure.

I am not going to undertake to read the evidence, or all of it at least, upon this point, but I want to call the attention of the Senate to the testimony of one lawyer, and I want to say, Mr. President, that there is absolutely no denial of the state of facts to which I have referred. I read from pages 722 and 723 of the testimony taken by the subcommittee of the Senate in the investigation held recently with reference to Mexican affairs:

My name is Charles A. Kinkel; I am a native-born American citizen; for the past eight years I have been a resident of El Paso, Tex. I have a ranch about 15 miles north of El Paso. On the afternoon of March 26, 1912, my wife, little boy, and I were leaving El Paso on our way to our ranch, traveling in a small automobile, known as a Buick runabout; we were in said machine coasting down a steep street known as Harts Viaduct, in the northwesterly part of El Paso—and when within about 25 feet from the bottom of said grade two soldiers of the American Army signaled us to stop; I immediately put my machine in neutral and put on brakes, but because of the very steep grade it was impossible to stop where the soldiers were standing; the machine coasted past them very slowly, coming to a stop, when one of the soldiers leveled his rifle at us and shot through the casing of the machine. I had the machine virtually stopped when the shot was fired, and we were not more than 40 or 50 feet from the soldier when he shot. The shot passed through the tire, about 20 inches from where my little boy's feet were resting on the running board, and had the bullet struck the steel rim of the machine it could have swerved and maimed or killed any or all of us. I remonstrated with the soldier, and he told me that he was working under orders to shoot if anyone did not stop promptly; he also told me to shut up and go on. They laughed at the incident and treated it as a joke.

This is within the city limits of El Paso—

The automobile in which we were riding was so small that we could not have carried any arms or ammunition of any consequence whatsoever; this shooting occurred in broad daylight, in the city limits of the city of El Paso, on a public highway which did not lead across the Mexican border; my wife was in delicate health and the shooting was a great shock to her. The soldier doing the shooting had no search warrant or any right to stop us or to molest us in any way.

I reported the incident to the commander of the United States soldiers here, who promised to have a court-martial to try the soldier, but he never did so. To the contrary, when I prosecuted the soldier in the civil court in El Paso his captain appeared at the trial and stated that he had received orders, which he transmitted to the soldier, to shoot into anyone who failed to stop when signaled; this officer admitted that the soldiers had no search warrant nor were they acting under orders or by authority from the city, county, or State officials, but purely under orders from military sources or from Washington direct. Recently Col. Steever, the commander here, stated that he had received orders from Washington to have counsel appointed to defend this soldier from prosecution.

This incident is but one of many others in which American citizens have been shot into, stopped, insulted, and searched by American soldiers without a warrant while attending to their own affairs on American soil.

Then he proceeds, Mr. President, to mention other incidents. We have other statements under oath of other citizens of El Paso to exactly the same effect as the testimony of Mr. Kinkel in this case.

Not only this, Mr. President, but for nearly 12 months in the city of El Paso, according to the testimony of various witnesses, including that of the assistant United States attorney and of the United States attorney himself, embraced in this record, the Mexican consul on American soil has been employing secret-service agents, stationing them at the international bridge between El Paso and Juarez, pointing out to American soldiers American men and American women crossing on the street cars to Juarez from El Paso, and having the American soldiers take those American women from the street cars and searched. By whom? By secret-service agents of the Mexican Government employed on this side of the line, according to the testimony of the United States attorney or his assistant in this case, with their knowledge, by the Mexican officials, and paid for by the Mexican consul on this side. I shall only call attention to the method used finally to stop outrages of that character.

I shall read only a very short extract from the testimony of C. E. Kelly, the mayor of the city of El Paso, Tex. Remember, Senators, El Paso is a city of from 50,000 to 60,000 people, a city built entirely of brick, with a commission form of government—one of the most modern, up-to-date, progressive, and healthiest cities of its size on this continent. The following question was put to Mr. Kelly by Senator SMITH, chairman of the subcommittee:

Senator SMITH. I should like to ask whether your official observations have led you to believe that large numbers of people have been employed in El Paso and vicinity by representatives of either revolutionary party or Government in Mexico in performing work incidental to this war?

Mr. KELLY. There is no doubt that they have been employed.

I want to interject right here that the testimony in this investigation shows that the Mexican consul, protected by the Department of Justice, so called, of the United States, has had in his employ, according to the sworn evidence of Mr. Madero's private personal representative, about 380 secret-service agents in the city of El Paso alone. These agents have been following men who went to the merchants of El Paso to purchase goods, shadowing them from the stores to their homes, following them into the lobbies of the hotels, congregating around where private conversations were being held, and actually interfering with the business of the American merchants in the American city of El Paso.

Mr. Kelly says:

There is no doubt that they have been employed. Several months ago I saw by the evening paper that secret-service men for the Madero Government were searching American citizens going over to Juarez, and that they were doing it on this side of the river. I made a call on the chief of police and had him send men from the station and arrest the people who were doing this act; and it was not long until they brought in several men to the city jail, and they found concealed weapons on some of them.

The State authorities in Texas could deal with those arrested who had concealed weapons upon them, and they did so. The United States court, the United States attorney, the United States officials, the secret-service men there under the United States Government, attached to the Department of Justice, have never undertaken to prosecute, have never undertaken to arrest, have never undertaken to present to grand juries these infractions of our law; but they have openly asserted that these people were placed there with the knowledge and by the consent of the Department of Justice of the United States, paid for by Consul Llorente, representing the Mexican Government, for the purpose of searching, among others, American women and children on American soil.

This same man has been able, through the State Department of the United States Government and through the Department of Justice of the United States Government, to secure the arrest of any man whom he desired to arrest on American soil. The treaty of extradition between this country and the Republic of Mexico, so-called, contains a provision that any one charged in Mexico with an offense or a crime coming under the provisions of that extradition treaty, upon affidavit made, or upon the action of the United States attorney or the diplomatic representative of his Government—not the consular agent, not the consul, but the diplomatic representative of his Government in this country—may be arrested and held for 40 days without trial, awaiting the papers from Mexico to be brought here and to be presented to our court before the extradition order is finally issued, such papers proving that the party is charged with an extraditable crime in some court of competent jurisdiction in Mexico, and that they are seeking his extradition.

We have a list here of the cases of that character—over 20, I will say, now—occurring in El Paso, practically every one of them filed by the United States attorney upon an affidavit made by a Mexican consul, not a diplomatic representative, every one of those men held for 40 days, and in no single instance any attempt made by the Mexican Government to produce the papers necessary for the extradition, and every one of those men has been turned loose under habeas corpus proceedings in the State or the United States court.

In one instance, Mr. President, a man was arrested first by the American soldiers near Presidio del Norte, carried to Marfa, tried for violation of the United States neutrality laws, and acquitted. As he was released and was attempting to leave the courtroom he was arrested on a telegram from the Mexican consul at El Paso, Tex., and carried without further authority to El Paso. There complaint was made by the United States attorney, based upon an affidavit by the Mexican consul that he would produce the papers showing that he was charged with an extraditable crime. He was held for 40 days, turned loose by the United States court because of failure to produce necessary papers or one particle of evidence against him, rearrested, confined for 40 days under a similar statement, turned loose by the United States court for that district, rearrested by the armed forces of the United States upon the same charge and held as a military prisoner at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., until discharged again under habeas corpus proceedings in the United States court, rearrested again under the same charge from the same

Mexican consul, held for 40 days again under the extradition treaty, and again turned loose by the United States court.

I cite these instances because I want the Senate to understand just why it is that the Mexican people, or the great majority of them, claim that the United States Government for two years has been intervening in the internecine trouble in the Republic of Mexico, and has by its own forces, by its officers of the law on this side and by its diplomatic agents on the other side, been seeking, without throwing its military forces or its marines or its sailors into Mexico, to do exactly what it has done by its marines and its sailors in Nicaragua.

Mr. President, I am going to trespass upon the time of the Senate because I say to you, Senators, it may not appear to you to be a matter of as much interest as the passing of a public buildings bill, providing an appropriation of $5,000 for the purchase of a post-office site in some growing and thriving and prosperous little town in the South; it may not appear to you now to be of as much interest to you to familiarize yourselves with the conditions in Mexico as it is to assist in the passage of such an appropriation bill; but I say to you, as I said to you last July, that you are going to be confronted with your duty, and the people of the United States are going finally to compel their representatives and their Government to do their duty; and you might just as well begin now to learn something of the truth of these conditions which you are going to have to meet, in my opinion, in a very short time.

How many of the Senators here know what the population of Mexico is, and of what class it is composed? How many have thought beyond mere generalities of what the form of government is, what it has been in the past, how many States there are in the Mexican Republic, and so on? Why, Mr. President, some of our very learned citizens know so little about Mexico that at least twenty times within the last five years, in New York, Chicago, Washington, and other cities in the United States, when it was learned that I was from New Mexico, I have been asked the question as to how I liked the Mexican laws and old Diaz's government!

The amount of misinformation and of ignorance in the United States concerning Mexico is just as astounding as is the ignorance existing in Mexico to-day concerning affairs in this country. I could not put it any stronger, because I have here in my pocket a translation of an article from one of the more prominent papers published in the Spanish language in the City of Mexico, in which it is said that if the United States Government should dare to intervene in Mexican affairs there would be a war between the North and the South immediately, because the people of the North were demanding intervention and the people of the South were opposed to it, and this difference of opinion would create another revolution or civil war in this country; and that further than that, the negroes, who had rested under the yoke of slavery for so many years, would take advantage of the confusion incident to and attendant upon an armed invasion of Mexico to throw off that yoke and rise against the people who had oppressed them.

This article contains the further statement that the American Army is composed simply of Italian filibusters. This article appeared in La Tribuna, published in the City of Mexico, and was circulated among the people there within the last three weeks.

I say, Mr. President, that I have cited this instance of the ignorance of the Mexican people of the true condition of affairs here to make stronger my point that the Congress of the United States, apparently, and certainly a great number of the people of the United States, are just as ignorant of Mexican affairs and conditions.

The Republic of Mexico is composed of 27 States, 2 Territories, and a Federal District, such as the District of Columbia. There never has been a correct census of the population of Mexico. There never has been a correct survey of the Republic of Mexico, of any State in it, or of the public lands in any State in it. The total population of Mexico approximates 15,000,000 people. Of the 15,000,000 people, approximately 60 per cent are Indians—sedentary Indians; not the nomadic tribes; not Indians of the class of our Comanches, Lipans, Sioux, or Apaches, but agricultural Indians; sedentary Indians, living up to two years ago in their little localities in the different States of the Republic, maintaining in many instances their own governments entirely distinct from the Mexican Government, as, for instance, the Mayas in Yucatan.

Mr. President, I am not going to ask for a quorum, because I do not care to interrupt Senators; but I would ask, if Senators do not care to listen, that they may not interrupt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Complaint is made that there is confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. FALL. I will ask the Senator not to make the point of no quorum. At 9 o'clock we go into executive session. There is only 15 minutes left, and I do not want to impose on Senators at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well; I withdraw the point.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I was simply attempting to explain very briefly the condition of affairs in Mexico. I had instanced the State of Yucatan, from which all the henequin crop comes, $75,000,000 worth of it every year, for the making of rope, cotton bagging, sacks, and so forth. Practically all of it comes to the United States. That is a very rich State, and yet over half of the territory of that State is occupied by two branches of the Maya Tribe of Indians, who owe no allegiance whatever to the Mexican Government except by treaty, in which treaty the Government of Mexico recognizes them as independent in all except the suzerainty of the National Government of Mexico generally over them. It interferes in no respect with their laws, which they enact for themselves. It makes no attempt whatsoever to place in force the laws of the National Government of Mexico nor the laws of the State government of Yucatan among the Mayas. They tax themselves; they are not taxed for State or National purposes.

Mr. President, practically the same state of affairs exists in every State of the Mexican Union. The Indians keep up their own tribal governments. Many have allied themselves with one side or the other, as they chose and as their interests have dictated, in the different wars and internecine troubles which have occurred in Mexico.

This has been true of the Yaquis, and is true to-day. While they have been overcome after 30 years' war, while thousands of them have been expatriated or have been sent to Tabasco and to Chiapas and to Campeche, yet there are now along the Yaqui River, where those people lived before the Spaniards came into Mexico, such a body of Yaquis as yet make themselves respected and whom the regular soldiers of Mexico to-day do not dare attempt to drive away from their little homes. Only those whom they have caught working out in the mining camps or in the towns, such as Hermosillo and other cities in Sonora, away from their tribes, have been sent away from their country. No Mexican soldier dares to go into the Yaqui country to-day and undertake to interfere with those people. They have called upon them recently to assist the Mexican Government in putting down the revolution; and practically the only fighting that has been done in the States of Chihuahua and Sonora for a year past upon the part of the federals, with all the accounts which have been published through the newspapers here, has been done by some Yaqui Indians under Gen. Saguinas.

Mr. President, of the other 80 per cent of the population of Mexico, 20 per cent are the Mexicans who are descendants of the Spaniards—the 20 per cent who own the property of Mexico so far as it yet remains in the hands of Mexicans; the 20 per cent who claim to themselves all the intelligence, the education, and the prerogative to govern. Twenty per cent of the total population—in other words, about 3,000,000 out of a total of 15,000,000—constitute the governing class of Mexico. With the exceptions which I shall point out in a moment, they own all the land, the mines, the ranches, the cultivated farms, the factories, all the improvements of every kind or character except that property owned by foreigners. Up to two years ago they formed an oligarchy such as has not been known in the civilized world for hundreds of years. They were banded together through the governors of the different States, who were, although nominally elected, in fact practically the appointees of Porfirio Diaz, the President of Mexico, and who in turn supported him. The elections have been a farce. There never has been an election in Mexico in which all those entitled to participate really did so. The governors of the States were told whom to name as electors. Not 1 per cent of the vote in the States was cast in any election; and if, between the time of the election and the declaration of the electoral vote, it suited the party in Chapultepec to order a change from one candidate to another, such a change was promptly made by all the electors.

It has been said that there is no middle class in Mexico. That has been true, and, as we understand a middle class, it is still true. Nevertheless, for the last 35 years the 20 per cent between the great governing class, the property owners on the one hand and, on the other hand, those natives who are living there to-day as they lived when Cortes came into the country—the 20 per cent between those two classes has gradually been acquiring a little knowledge, gradually acquiring a little learning, gradually understanding more and more what was going on in the world outside of their little, limited sphere. For over 10 years past from 15,000 to 75,000 laboring Mexicans have come across the American border every year, working on the railroads from California to Galveston. They have been doing all of the section work upon the Southern Pacific, the Rock Island, the Texas Pacific, and practically all the other railroads in the southwestern country. They have been making the beet-sugar crop in southern Colorado, going even into the State of Kansas, and picking cotton in the fields of Texas, Louisiana, and as far east as Georgia. A man of that class has come across on this side as a blanketed Mexican, with a pair of sandals on his feet, a broad-brimmed straw hat on his head, and his few remaining articles of clothing, together with his meals for a day or two, wrapped up in a piece of white cotton. Eight months afterwards he has gone back across the Mexican line to visit his relatives, friends, and family in Mexico, with a valise in his hand, with American shoes on his feet, American clothes on his body, and an American hat on his head. He has carried throughout the remotest confines of the Mexican Republic the news that there is another country near at hand in which a man is a man and is so treated.

Men of this class have come into New Mexico, and they have found there that 50 per cent of the population is of their own blood and is free to go to the polls and vote. They have found men of their own race occupying the county offices, and one of them presiding over the State Senate of New Mexico as well as any parliamentary body could be presided over—E. C. de Baca, the lieutenant governor of the State. They find that here, in this country, they get the same wages as the residents of the country in similar occupations. They find that instead of being compelled to put their hats under their left arm when they approach a section boss when they do their duty they are just as good as the section boss himself or any employer. They find in New Mexico, for instance, that if they have their little troubles they can, in many districts in that State, go before justices of the peace of their own blood, and they find that their own language is spoken in many of the States of the United States. All the way to Chicago they find friends who have come from Mexico, located along the railroads, and doing work as laborers in our cities and upon our farms. Some of those people, of course, go back. Others—two or three times the number—come to take their places. This is one fact which has had as much to do with the present condition of affairs in Mexico as any other, and should be considered together with the further fact that this same class have been learning to read and write, until I may astonish some of you by saying that at least 70 per cent of this ignorant class who come across into the United States if asked to write their names can do so.

Mr. President, it is from among this class of people that there has come for the last two years the leaders in this revolution and in the troubles which have been going on in Mexico. Mr. Diaz himself did not realize that the revolution, when it broke out two years since, had been prepared for by the experiences of the returning immigrants from this country and by the semi-educational advantages which had been availed of by many of the working class.

Not a prominent man of the old families has been named in the revolution, and not a prominent man went to the aid of the Government when that Government was attacked in the Madero revolution. Very few of the prominent Mexicans, not a lawyer, not a banker, scarcely a man of this 20 per cent of the governing class came to aid old Porfirio Diaz, who had maintained law and order in Mexico for 35 years. Owing to these facts, and even more largely to the militant socialistic teachings, to which I shall call the attention of Senators later, Mexico is in such a condition now that I want to say in all seriousness to the Senators of the United States that I do not believe there is any power in Mexico which of itself can restore and maintain order, law, and peace.

I should like to close my remarks at this point, as I believe it is only one minute of the time when it was understood we should go into executive session. Of course, I desire it understood that I will have the floor in the discussion of this report afterwards.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOURNE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amended paragraph insert the following:

"For inland transportation by railroad routes, $51,500,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying the mail over the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., other than upon a mileage basis: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may in his discretion pay within the present law a fair and reasonable price for the special transfer and terminal service at the Union Station at East St. Louis, Ill., and at the Union Station at St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting and heating of the mail building, and transfer service at St. Louis, Mo., provided the amount so paid shall not exceed $35,000: And provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from the enactment of section 8 of the act of August 24, 1912, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after July 1, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding 5 per cent thereof per annum, excepting upon routes weighed since January 1, 1913, and to be readjusted from July 1, 1913, until otherwise provided by law: And provided further, That the joint committee to make inquiry into the subject of postage on second-class mail matter and compensation for the transportation of mail provided for by the act of August 24, 1912, shall make an inquiry into the question of the transportation of second-class mail matter in fast freight trains and the manner of handling incident thereto, and report upon the same and the best method of effecting its discontinuance if such be found advisable."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.,
BOIES PENROSE,
J. H. BANKHEAD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN A. MOON,
D. E. FINLEY,
JOHN W. WEEKS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. BRISTOW. If we are going into executive session soon I would rather have the report go over until after the executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas is recognized and can proceed.

Mr. FALL. Does that displace the Indian appropriation bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not, except to temporarily suspend its consideration.

Mr. BRISTOW. It will take some time to dispose of this report, I will say.

Mr. GAMBLE. Do I understand that there is to be protracted debate on the conference report upon the Post Office appropriation bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not answer that question.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not hear the remark of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. GAMBLE. I was making inquiry of the Chair whether there was to be protracted debate on the conference report.

Mr. BRISTOW. It may be protracted. I am very much opposed to the adoption of this report.

Mr. GAMBLE. If that is true, with the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill before the Senate, I think I will interpose an objection.

Mr. BRISTOW. That puts it over, then, until after the executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is entitled to the floor.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26874) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, as I was saying, in addition to and in direct connection with the revolution which I have referred to as tending to bring about the present condition of affairs in Mexico, or at least to prepare the people of that country for the present condition in which they are found, is the fact that more than seven years ago there was organized in the United States, in the city of St. Louis, what was known as the Liberal Party of Mexico. A committee, at least, of what was called the Liberal Party of Mexico was organized in St. Louis something over seven years ago. They were supplied with funds from various sources. Some of those sources were agents or sympathizers in the Republic of Mexico, others sympathizers, individuals, and in some instances, at least, organizations in the United States of America.

The testimony which is lying on the desks of Senators, obtained from the records of United States courts, particularly those of the southern district of California, at Los Angeles, will show the sources from which sums of money aggregating approximately a thousand dollars a month came from sympathizers in the United States, to be used for the publication of a paper known as the "Regeneracion," and for the dissemination of socialistic literature printed in the Spanish language throughout the different States of the Mexican Republic.

Seven years ago, in July, there was a strike of the miners employed in the American mines in Cananea, in the State of Sonora in the Republic of Mexico. Over 5,000 men were at that time working underground in the great copper mines belonging to one company alone operating in that district. Two or three nights before the strike occurred a woman patient in the hospital of Cananea told a story to the physician in charge, in which he put very little credence. He, however, fortunately imparted the information which he had received from her to another man who knew the Mexican character thoroughly, who had lived among the Mexicans around Cananea and in Sonora for thirty-odd years, and who, as a matter of fact, was at the head of this great mining company.

An investigation immediately was ordered, and it was discovered that 26 cases of dynamite had been stolen from the stores of the company; that arms had been stolen from the town hall; and the story which this woman told was corroborated in every instance by the investigation set upon foot by the Americans. The story was to the effect that under cloak of a strike of the miners, as a matter of fact a revolution was to be started in Mexico; that documents could be discovered in certain hiding places showing that this strike was being ordered by the liberal committee of the so-called Mexican Liberal Party from St. Louis, Mo.

Immediately steps were taken to suppress any riots which might accompany a so-called attempted strike, and in doing so arms were obtained by special train from Bisbee, on the American side of the border. These arms reached Cananea and were distributed among the Americans, or some of the Americans there, of whom at that time there were something like 100 or 125 men, at about 4 o'clock in the morning. At 5 o'clock in the morning the strike began. About 7 o'clock in the morning the lumber yards, with $500,000 worth of lumber, had been burned; the Americans in charge of them had been killed; 2,500 maddened men were proceeding under red flags to the bank, the store, the concentrator, and other buildings in Cananea crying, "Down with the Americans! Down with Diaz! Down with the Government! Viva the Liberal Party! We will take the money from the banks, rob the stores, drive out the Americans. Mexico for the Mexicans!"

One hundred and twenty Mexicans engaged in this riot were killed before it could be suppressed and many Americans lost their lives. Then upon an investigation and a search the revolutionary literature was found where this woman had said it would be discovered, and lists of the agents of this anarchistical party in the different districts in the different States of Mexico were obtained. Their sympathizers among their own race along the border were known. The parties in St. Louis were indicted and, under a suit for damages brought for the purpose, the press and the materials of the newspaper which they were publishing were seized, and at the same time other documents were seized showing the ramifications of this socialistic organization in almost every district in the different States of the Mexican Republic.

These documents, I may say, went into the hands of the then Vice President of the Republic, Ramon Corral, and were used by him, as the head of the secret service department, in his investigation of affairs in Mexico, and his investigation led up to some few of the prominent men holding office in the Republic at that time; and such investigation which he carried on and knowledge which he obtained assisted in rendering him so unpopular in the Mexican Republic that when Mr. Diaz forced him for a second time upon the people as a candidate on the ticket for Vice President it resulted in trouble, which continued until the outbreak of the Madero revolution and the final overthrow of the Diaz government.

Mr. President, published in this RECORD under the head of Testimony of Dudley Robinson, assistant United States attorney, and of Mr. McCormick, United States attorney for the southern district of California, you will not only find the extracts from the court records containing the evidence of the three principal men of this revolutionary committee, but you will also find the Spanish and translated copies of the platform which the Liberal Party for seven years past has been advocating and circulating throughout the length and breadth of Mexico and which it is to-day circulating. In every document dealing with the reforms which they propose to bring about, which they have sent through the press and their agents into Mexico, in practically every issue of their paper which has been circulated, and which you will find in the pocket of nearly every man in the revolutionary ranks to-day, they are appealing to the Indians who owned the original land, who owned the lands before the Spaniards came to Mexico, who owned the property, who own, as they claim, the Republic of Mexico as it stands to-day, to confiscate the property belonging to other people, to partition it among themselves, to join Madero, to put Diaz out of office, to join with anyone else to put Madero out of office, and enjoy life and happiness as they enjoyed it before they were interfered with by the oppressor, the white man.

Now, Mr. President, think what the effect must be upon an ignorant population of at least 10,000,000 out of 15,000,000 people to be told by intelligent men, because these men are intelligent, that the property which they see and which they know in that little community all belongs to them, that they must take it back, that they need no government.

Remember they have never taken part in the government of their country, that they need no laws, and remember further that every law that has ever been passed in Mexico has been against this class of people and not in their favor. Then remember that they have a middle class, this 20 per cent between the higher or governing class and the 60 per cent of the Indian population, with only a smattering of knowledge, composed largely of people in whom the Indian blood predominates and whose sympathies are more nearly allied with those of the 60 per cent Indian population and who are naturally the leaders of that population, and you can readily understand why it is that Zapata, a bandit, can defy the power of the Mexican Government with impunity for years.

Then you can understand why it is that Ynez Salazar and the other so-called leaders have sympathizers in every town and in the ranks of the regular troops themselves, and how it is that the ammunition excluded to them from this side of the border—as is shown by the sworn evidence in this case—they are procuring to-day for their Mauser rifles from the Federal garrisons throughout the Republic of Mexico. Then you can begin to understand, if you can picture these conditions, the influences which have been at work now for seven years, at least, continuously upon these people, calling upon them to rise up in their might and to take the property, to divide it up among themselves, and to yield no authority to anyone. You can begin to understand something of the condition as existing in Mexico to-day among 80 per cent of the population of that Republic. But I can not begin to make you understand the apathy which has been displayed by the 20 per cent of the people of Mexico who have arrogated to themselves the privilege of governing the remaining portion of the population.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from New Mexico will yield to me, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FALL. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 37 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

During the consideration of executive business, and as in legislative session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appoints the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] as conferees on the part of the Senate on the naval appropriation bill in the place of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

BRIDGE ACROSS CADDO LAKE, LA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 28633) to amend the act approved January 27, 1912, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Caddo Lake, in Louisiana," which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act approved January 27, 1912, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Caddo Lake, in Louisiana," be, and hereby is, amended so as to extend the time at which the construction of the bridge shall begin one year, and the time of the completion thereof be likewise extended one year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DESERT-LAND ENTRIES IN RIVERSIDE COUNTY, CAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7875) to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in the Chuckawalla Valley and Palo Verde Mesa, Riverside County, Cal., which was, on page 2, line 7, to strike out "sixteen" and insert "fifteen."

Mr. WORKS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26874) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, as I was remarking a few moments before the first interruption occurred yesterday afternoon, I believe it was, in considering the present condition of affairs of the neighboring country of the so-called Republic of Mexico, I have undertaken to show by citing one or two statements of witnesses and referring to the contents of the record made by the committee of the Senate in its investigation what is the condition of the Mexican people at the present time, and particularly I had been explaining what had led up to the status which has brought about or which other circumstances possibly have caused to develop into the present condition of those poor people.

Mr. President, I have referred to the evidence in this case showing that a socialistic—a militant socialistic—program had been carried on for many years, and now I want to read an extract from the platform known as the San Luis Potosi plan, promulgated by Francisco I. Madero and adopted as the foundation for his campaign for the presidency against Porfirio Diaz.

In this platform, which is somewhat lengthy, as will appear from the reading on page 733 of the report of the special subcommittee on Mexican Affairs, it appears that Mr. Madero adopted a plank which at least was construed to mean, if it did not mean, exactly the same thing as the plank in the liberal party platform to which I have referred in the course of my remarks. This platform provides that—

> In abuse of the law on public lands, numerous proprietors of small holdings, in their greater part Indians, have been dispossessed of their lands by rulings of the department of public development (fomento) or by decisions of the tribunals of the Republic. As it is just to restore to their former owners the lands of which they were dispossessed in such an arbitrary manner, such rulings and decisions are declared subject to revision, and those who have acquired them in such an immoral manner, or their heirs, will be required to restore them to their former owners, to whom they shall also pay an indemnity for the damages suffered.

And upon this platform Mr. Madero went into power. Many thousands of those who had revolted against Diaz, or the old conditions, remained under arms after Madero's election, awaiting to see what would be done in carrying out the preelection pledges of Madero with reference to confiscation and redistribution of lands. The Madero platform was construed by them to promise such confiscation, and the majority of these revolutionists were the avowed followers of the liberal party program of redistribution of all property. Madero, of course, could not satisfy these demands, and the revolution continued against his administration in every State of Mexico until finally the occurences in Mexico City, resulting in his death, shocked the world.

Mr. President, having spoken of the condition of affairs in Mexico at the present time as affecting the people of that so-called Republic, and commented upon the fact that, in my judgment, conditions among those people unfortunately are such that it is practically impossible for them to restore order and maintain peace in their country, I desire to refer to such conditions as affecting the life and property of American citizens within that Republic. In doing so, Mr. President, I shall first read a statement of one of the witnesses before this committee. This witness, I may say, Mr. President, I have the pleasure to know personally. He is a large property owner in the State of Texas and a large property owner in the Republic of Mexico, a very intelligent gentleman, and one thoroughly informed as to Mexican affairs. I can not, of course, appeal to Senators to listen to it, but I desire to read into the RECORD for the benefit of the people of the United States, who with so much avidity seize an opportunity to peruse the pages which are printed here every morning, extracts from his testimony. In the examination of this witness, as set forth on pages 38 and 39 of this report, in answer to questions propounded to him, he says, referring to property rights——

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. GAMBLE. If there be no further discussion on the pending motion, I ask that it be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, when interrupted I was about to read from the testimony of Mr. Newman, on pages 38 and 39 of the record. In answer to a question propounded by the chairman of the committee—and, Mr. President and Senators, I want to say that this testimony is the key to an understanding of the present condition in Mexico as affecting Americans.

I shall not trespass upon the patience of the Senate to read the other evidence corroborative of Mr. Newman's, but I do ask a moment's consideration by Senators of this testimony. Referring to the rights of Americans in Mexico, Senator SMITH asked the witness:

> And their rights interfered with?
> Mr. NEWMAN. Yes, sir.
> Senator SMITH. And their property menaced?
> Mr. NEWMAN. Yes, sir.
> Senator SMITH. Were there any cases where lives were threatened?
> Mr. NEWMAN. Yes; I know of one case, under the first, or Madero revolution. At the town of Minaca, in the State of Chihuahua, four of them stood a man up—

Referring to an American—> pointed their guns at him, and told him he would have to pay a ransom, and pay it quick. There was an old German there who had been in business for a long time, and he pleaded with them, and finally got the men over to his store, gave them a drink or two, and sneaked this American out back of some buildings, got him on to a horse, and got him away.

> Senator SMITH. Did they threaten the German in any way?
> Mr. NEWMAN. They did not threaten the German in any way.
> Senator SMITH. Why not?
> Mr. NEWMAN. It seems, unfortunately, to be the impression of the Mexicans throughout their country that the Germans and English must be respected. The point that they frequently raise is this—and this is true of all of them, even to the lowest peon—they say, "If we disturb the English and the Germans, and the other foreigners in here, with the exception of the Spaniards, then their Governments will force the United States to do something. Therefore we must not do anything to them." They feel that the United States for herself will not do anything at all, and they feel that the United States will not do anything to protect the Spaniards. The Spaniards have been treated worse than any people in the country. I mean the citizens of Spain. The ordinary Mexican hates the Spaniards worse than poison, especially on the west coast, down where our land is. There were quite a number of Spaniards in there, engaged in the fruit business—bananas, limes, and lemons, and so forth—and I understand from a man we have in charge out there that they killed every one of them, robbed, their stores, and cleaned them out; and they were wealthy, too.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BOURNE. I ask the Senator in charge of the Indian appropriation bill if he will consent to taking up the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. GAMBLE. I will ask the Senator from Oregon whether he expects any discussion on the conference report on that bill?

Mr. BOURNE. I am informed that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has some remarks to make in reference to the bill. How long the discussion will last I can not state.

Mr. GAMBLE. If it is not to consume undue time, I will yield for that purpose, and only for that purpose.

Mr. BRISTOW. What did I understand the Senator from South Dakota to inquire?

Mr. GAMBLE. I stated that I would yield if the discussion is not to be protracted.

Mr. BRISTOW. It may be protracted. I intend to endeavor to show——

Mr. GAMBLE. Then I shall interpose an objection, and I interpose it at this time.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I move to take up the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. GAMBLE. No; I will yield. I simply do not want the Indian bill displaced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. GAMBLE. I simply want to suggest that I offered to yield to the Senator from Oregon, but I do not want the Indian appropriation bill displaced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion made by the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the conference report.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, in the Post Office appropriation bill as it passed the Senate and went to conference there was an amendment, numbered 26, which reads as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying the mail over the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., other than upon a mileage basis: But provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, pay within the present law a fair and reasonable price for the special transfer and terminal service at the Union Station at East St. Louis, Ill., and at the Union Station at St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting, and heating of the mail building, and transfer service at St. Louis, Mo., provided the amount so paid shall not exceed $20,000.

The conference report changes that proviso by inserting $35,000 in place of $20,000. The evidence before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads showed that these railroads would not be entitled, upon the mileage basis, to more than about $15,000 for this service. The St. Louis Terminal Co. has been absorbed by the railroad companies that use it; so that in this instance we will pay to the railroads that enter St. Louis for terminal services more than twice as much, proportionately, as is paid the railroads in any other city in the United States for similar service.

I can not see why the conference committee should yield and increase the pay, making it $20,000 a year more than the railroads are entitled to for this terminal service; yet that has been done.

But that is not the most serious objection to this amendment, as reported by the committee of conference. On line 6, page 20, of the bill there is another proviso, which reads as follows:

Provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from the establishment of the parcel post the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to weigh the mails on railroad routes, for not less than 30 successive working days, and to readjust compensation from the date of the commencement of said weighing at not exceeding the rates provided by law.

In lieu of that proviso, which says that the Postmaster General may order a reweighing of the mails to determine whether or not the railroads are entitled on account of the parcel post to any more compensation than they now receive, the conference report submits the following:

Provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from the enactment of section 8 of the act of August 24, 1912, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after July 1, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding 5 per cent thereof per annum, excepting upon routes weighed since January 1, 1913, and to be readjusted from July 1, 1913, until otherwise provided by law.

There is an appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes of $51,500,000. No man knows, and no man can know, what is to be the additional weight which the railroads will carry because of the parcel post. Yet it is proposed in this amendment to give them an increase of 5 per cent in the amount of railway mail pay, presumably because there is an increase of that much in the weight. The amendment as it passed the Senate provided for a weighing to determine how much they were entitled to receive, if anything. I can not understand how any Senator can come to the conclusion that it is his duty to add 5 per cent to the railway mail pay in the United States because of an increase of weight the amount of which he has no possible way of determining. I am here to protest against increasing the pay of the railroads for carrying the mails unless we have some substantial evidence that they need it and ought to have it under the law.

The Postmaster General has said, in an official statement, that the railroads are paid $9,000,000 a year more than they ought to receive. That has been denied most vigorously by the railways; and there has been going on for the last three months a campaign for increased railway pay for carrying the mails that probably has been as complete and thorough as any campaign of the kind that has ever been made in the United States. There probably is not a Senator here who has not received letters from station agents in his own State urging increased pay to the railroads for carrying the mails. They have been told by their superior officials that it is necessary, in order to increase their meager salaries, that the railways shall get more money, and they have been asked to write to their Senators and Congressmen in behalf of increased pay for the railways.

Whether the railways are paid more than they ought to be paid or are not paid enough I do not positively know, but I believe the railway mail pay in the United States is too high; that they are paid too much. That is my opinion. If the parcel post increases the weight, and the present rate of payment is a just rate, then they ought to have more pay; but in order to tell what they ought to have we must know what the increased weight is, and that no man can tell.

We are now making an appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914. It is proposed in this bill to increase their pay 5 per cent. They may be entitled to more than 5 per cent. They may not be entitled to 5 per cent. I protest against giving them this additional pay unless we know they are entitled to it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In case we reweigh the mails, which will be necessary if the recommendation of the Post Office Committee be adopted, has the Senator made any calculation as to the probable increased cost to the Government through reweighing the mail, and then the per cent of increase that might be found incident to that reweighing?

The point I am making is, does the Senator think the 5 per cent flat increase would be greater or less than the expense of reweighing the mail, and then adding the resulting per cent of increase on the same rate we are now paying?

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand that the cost of reweighing would be about $500,000. Whether or not the additional weight would entitle the railroads to two and a half millions a year, which is approximately what this would be, at least for the first year, is something I do not know, and no one knows.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Upon the basis of 5 per cent on what is being paid now, what would be the aggregate increase?

Mr. BRISTOW. The appropriation is $51,500,000. Five per cent of that would be something over two and a half millions.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. The appropriation of $51,500,000 allows two and a half million dollars for the proposed maximum 5 per cent increase. The appropriation for railway mail pay as it came from the House was $49,000,000, so $49,000,000 would be the basis on which to make the calculation.

Mr. BRISTOW. That would be approximately two and a half million dollars.

There is another provision in this conference report to which I wish to refer:

And provided further, That the joint committee to make inquiry into the subject of postage on second-class mail matter and compensation for the transportation of mail provided for by the act of August 24, 1912, shall make an inquiry into the question of the transportation of second-class mail matter in fast freight trains and the manner of handling incident thereto, and report upon the same and the best method of effecting its discontinuance if such be found advisable.

The law of last year provided that when the mail was reweighed, what is known as the blue-tag system should expire with the reweighing. The blue-tag system is the policy by which some of the magazines are put on freight trains, while others are carried in the mails. An economy has been effected in the department by carrying a certain percentage of the magazines of the country in freight trains, thereby saving the mail rate. This has caused great dissatisfaction, however, and has been a very grave injustice, because as between two magazines of exactly the same character of literature, printed in the same city, one has been put on a freight train and the other has been put into the fast mails. The Postmaster General has assumed to himself that discretion. The result is that the magazine that goes in the freight trains reaches its subscribers from one to nine days later than its competitor does. This has very gravely injured the business of many legitimate publishers, especially in the case of trade journals and journals of a similar character. It has been very burdensome on the publishers of the smaller magazines and periodicals.

Mr. BOURNE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. BOURNE. I am in perfect accord with the Senator's views on the blue-tag question. As I understood the Senator he stated that the act of last year provided that the blue-tag system should be abolished on the different sections as a weighing took place.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. BOURNE. The Senator is mistaken on that. The act of last year provides as follows:

From and after the passage of this act the Post Office Department shall not extend or enlarge its present policy of sending second-class matter by freight trains.

The idea of that was to prevent the Postmaster General from putting the blue tag on sections 1 and 4, the Postmaster General having put it first upon section 3 and second upon section 2. The idea of the committee, and the idea of Congress, by its action, was to prohibit any enlargement of that action on the part of the department.

Mr. BRISTOW. The bill as it passed the Senate last year required the blue-tag system to be abolished at the recurring periods of weighing, did it not?

Mr. BOURNE. I can not answer that. I was referring to the bill as it passed Congress.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not know that the provision as to the blue-tag system had been changed in the conference. I had in my mind the phraseology of the bill as we reported it from the committee. I am somewhat surprised when I read—not having recurred to it since the adjourned session—that the blue tag was not abolished on the existing routes, but its extension was simply prevented.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the Senator is correct. I think when the bill passed the Post Office Committee in its final form and was brought to the Senate last year the provision was that upon the termination of the period of weights then in existence the blue-tag system should be abolished, and that length of time was given only in order to obviate a reweighing.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is as I understand it; and I have clearly in mind that after an elaborate discussion that was the decision of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, I am astonished to see how the provision reads. I did not take occasion to look into the law as it finally passed. I presume the form in which it appears as law is another act of the conference committee that some of us were not aware of at the time of its passage here.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to say, Mr. President, that in my judgment it would have been impossible to have secured the indorsement of this provision in the bill by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I know that if I had had the slightest idea that this amendment would have been rewritten in this way for the purpose of giving 5 per cent additional pay to the already overpaid railroads for handling the mail it would not have passed this body, for I should have made the point of order, and it would have been clearly within the point of order.

I do not believe a conference committee has the right to rewrite a clause in a way that is not in harmony with the sentiments of the committee or of either body of the American Congress without first submitting the question to that body for its approval or disapproval. My complaint is that if it was the purpose of the conferees to make a conference report which should include this increase in railway mail pay they should have first consulted the Senate, and should have gotten its decision or an expression from it as to its desires.

We are having too many laws written by a few Senators and Members of Congress in conference committees. I think it is time to stop it, and I do not know any better time to make a start than right now on this bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have just come into the Chamber. Will the Senator please state, or repeat if he has already stated, what amount of increase the provision which he is discussing makes in the railway mail pay?

Mr. BRISTOW. Five per cent. I will read it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What would that amount to in the aggregate or the gross?

Mr. BRISTOW. Approximately two and a half million dollars a year.

I do not care to take any great amount of time of the Senate on this matter. I have tried to present it clearly.

In the face of a statement from the Postmaster General that the railway mail pay is now $9,000,000 in excess of what it ought to be, I do not believe the American Congress is ready to increase it above what it now is by 5 per cent, or approximately two and a half million dollars a year. I hope the Senate will disagree to the conference report and send the bill back to the conferees.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In the beginning of the Senator's discussion of this clause he made reference to the terminals at St. Louis. If I understood the Senator aright, he made the statement that the increased mileage which would be allowed would amount to only about $15,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. Something less than $15,000 was the testimony before the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As I understood the proposition, the railroads had acquired possession of this property, and the contract existing before they acquired possession of the property was to the effect that the railroads must carry the mail in St. Louis, but owing to the showing the railroads made that they had to pay to a private corporation for the use of the bridge and for the use of the terminals and for light and fuel they were allowed $50,000. After they acquired this property, where does the Senator find that there is an increased mileage charge and that they are entitled to $15,000?

Mr. BRISTOW. Originally the St. Louis Terminal Co. was an independent company, and the contract with the railroad by the Government was to deliver the mail to the terminal company, and they were paid a mileage basis up to the point where the terminal company took the mail. Then the railroads were allowed $50,000 for the purpose of paying the terminal company.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Plus the additional mileage?

Mr. BRISTOW. That was for the service the terminal company rendered them in handling the mail.

I do not think that that was ever justified. I think that the railroads that had mail contracts should have been required to deliver St. Louis mail to St. Louis, Mo., and should have been paid on a mileage basis, the same as all railroads are paid for the use of the terminals where they own them.

But years ago a different system in St. Louis was adopted, whereby the railroads there, upon the theory that they did not own their terminals, were paid so much more than they were paid in cities where they did own their own terminals. Since that arrangement was entered into the railroads entering St. Louis have absorbed the St. Louis Terminal Co., so that it is no longer an independently owned company. It is owned by the railroads. It is just as much the property of the railroads as the terminals in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York are the property of the railroads. In none of those terminal cities are the railroads paid anything additional for the terminal service; but this fiction has been kept alive in St. Louis, until last year the House of Representatives struck out the amount of $50,000. In the adjustment of the difference between the two Houses the provision which we find in the present bill was restored and they were allowed $35,000 instead of $50,000, which they had been receiving. When the Committee on Post Offices met this year, as the Senator from South Carolina will remember, we went into the matter with care. On the showing made to us it clearly appeared that on the mileage basis the St. Louis railroads would not be entitled to more than about $15,000 for the service which they were rendering at St. Louis; that is, if the St. Louis Terminal, which is owned by the railroads, was paid on the same basis as every other terminal the department would pay between $14,000 and $15,000 for that service.

But in order to be on the safe side, to cover all contingencies, the committee thought it would be very generous, and reported the bill to the Senate with an allowance of $20,000. It comes back from the committee of conference increased from $20,000 to $35,000. I say nothing can be found anywhere to justify this increase.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I just want to ask on this point, so that the Senate can get at the real equity in it. The $15,000 was counted on additional mileage, without computing in the $15,000 any of the facilities other than mere mileage at the terminal.

Mr. BRISTOW. It was computed upon the same basis exactly that all other railroads are paid for the use of their terminals in all other cities, and based upon such computation they would be entitled to from $14,000 to $15,000 for the services rendered at St. Louis.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will allow me, after we have given them extra mileage to deliver the mail, as they are under contract to do, I should like to know how, by the arbitrary action of the conference committee, $20,000 has been added as a bonus when it is not given to the others.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. In the legislative branch of our Government there are two Houses. As the Post Office appropriation bill came from the House of Representatives there was no provision in reference to the East St. Louis Terminal Co. If the Senate had made no provision, the law of 1899 would have been in operation and the Government would have paid, as it has every year since that date, with the exception of last year, the sum of $50,000 to the East St. Louis Terminal Co.

As the Senator from Kansas has said, the Senate put into the bill a limitation of $20,000. The House having provided no limitation, the law of 1899 would have applied and $50,000 would have been paid for this service.

In conference the House conferees insisted on the House provision. As a compromise the Senate conferees suggested the substitution of that which is now before the Senate, namely, the reenactment of the provision of last year.

Last year we had a series of hearings in reference to the East St. Louis Terminal Co. That company owns two bridges from East St. Louis to St. Louis. The claim is made by a number of railroads interested in that company that it is a separate entity. The claim is made by the members of the East St. Louis Terminal Co. that it costs them $61,000, as I remember the amount, to render the service to the Government in handling in this terminal.

If this is a separate entity and if the actual cost of doing this work for the Government is $61,000, they are entitled to $61,000.

As one of the Members of the Senate and of the committee and as one of the conferees, I am not satisfied in my own mind as to what the status is. There is a division of opinion in reference to it. They claim that it is sui generis, as the Senator from Kansas stated. If his impression is correct that it is simply a terminal, the same as the other terminals of the United States, then they are not entitled to any compensation whatever other than on the mileage basis.

A bill has been introduced here repealing the law of 1899. It has been favorably reported, it is on the calendar, and I assume that at the next Congress that question will be settled; but it is not settled yet. The opinion of the conferees on the part of the Senate was that it was better to make this compromise, reenacting the provision that we put into the law last year, rather than yield to the House conferees and make no provision at all. By our action we save the Government $15,000. By the action of the Senate committee, if the House conferees and the House had agreed to it, we would save the Government $30,000. But the House insisted on no provision and we insisted on the provision as it was expressed by the Senate, and we finally compromised on the provision that both branches of Congress had approved in the legislation of last year, thus saving the Government $15,000 by not agreeing with the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to state that the Supreme Court of the United States has found, in a decision rendered, that the St. Louis Terminal Co. is owned by the railroads that run into St. Louis, and that it is not a separate corporation or entity. It is no more an independent concern than any other corporation which is owned by the railroads. I am willing to take the findings of the Supreme Court of the United States as to that and base my action upon its finding.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Kansas that so far as the terminals at St. Louis are concerned, at least under the conference report, we have cut their arbitrary claims, and beyond any question we will at the next session abolish the existing provision with regard to the $50,000 a year and force them to their proper status, paying to those companies only the mileage which they ought to receive for going into St. Louis. That I do not consider an important question, with reference to this conference report, but to undertake arbitrarily to determine that we will allow 5 per cent increase to the railroads for the parcel post without knowing anything about what that service will amount to I think is a mistake. I do not see how we can justify it. It may be that the service will be more; it may be that it will be less. What the service is we should pay and not undertake in advance to estimate it.

Now, I want to suggest that by the 1st of next January we will be in a far better position to know the facts. Then we ought to be able approximately to estimate what increased service has been rendered on account of the parcel post. Of course, in some respects, the parcel post will reduce the service now being rendered, for a part of the mail now going in other ways will go by parcel post.

I want to suggest this substitute for the provision in the report of the conference committee:

The joint committee on parcel post shall report to Congress by January 1, 1914, the amount of additional mail carried by the railroad companies in consequence of the adoption of the parcel post and the provision that may be made to pay for the same.

Mr. BOURNE. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. I should like to ask the Senator how the joint committee could comply with his suggested substitute, if it were adopted, without a special weighing-in order to get an ascertainment as to the increase of business?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In reply to that I will ask the Senator a question. How did the conferees reach the conclusion that 5 per cent is just?

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me, I will be very glad to make an explanation to the Senate as to the action of the conferees. I was waiting until the Senator from Kansas had completed his remarks before attempting to explain it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would be very glad to yield to the Senator from Oregon if he desires to explain it now.

Mr. BOURNE. I can wait until the Senator concludes or I will go on now.

Mr. BRISTOW. Go on now, and then I will take the floor.

Mr. BOURNE. First, referring to the statement of the Senator from Kansas as to the bill as it passed the Senate last year, abolishing the blue tag upon the regular weighing period, no such provision was in the bill as it passed the Senate. The provision that was in the bill as it passed the Senate was the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], to which the conferees disagreed, the House declining to agree, and finally Congress enacted legislation now in the law, which I read a while ago. I think every Senator here will recognize that if Congress places a burden upon any of our citizens it is the duty of Congress, as the servant of the people, to give her citizens compensation in accordance with the services rendered.

In the last Congress we enacted section 8 of the Post Office appropriation bill, known as the parcel-post legislation. It was an enlargement of the activity of fourth-class mail matter, increasing the maximum weight limit and materially decreasing the rates. The improved service must necessarily lead to an increase in the use of that service.

I do not think any Senator will contend that there will be no additional business incident to what is known as the parcel-post legislation. The difficulty is to determine what compensation is justly due to the transportation companies because of this increased burden.

On the 20th of January the Postmaster General addressed a letter to me as chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, in which he recommended, under the item "for transportation on inland routes," in the Post Office bill coming from the House the insertion of this item:

Provided, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from the establishment of the parcel post the Postmaster General is authorized to weigh the mails on railroad routes in the fall of 1913 for not less than 30 successive working days, and to readjust compensation from the date of the commencement of said weighing at not exceeding the rates provided by law.

I submitted in the committee an amendment practically the same as I have just read, and on page 21 of the bill, lines 1 to 8, inclusive, the Senate approved of this legislation:

Provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from the establishment of the parcel post the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to weigh the mails on railroad routes for not less than 30 successive working days, and to readjust the compensation from the date of the commencement of said weighing at not exceeding the rates provided by law.

It will be seen that it is practically the same as was recommended by the Postmaster General in his letter of January 20 to the committee, to follow the item quoted. To continue the reading of the same letter, the Postmaster General says:

To defray the expenses of such a weighing and for the increased expenditure for railroad transportation resulting therefrom in the fiscal year of 1914, it will be necessary to add the sum of $9,173,000 to the amount previously estimated—$49,661,000—for the item "Inland transportation by railroad routes," making the total amount of the estimate for that item $58,834,000. The estimate of $9,173,000 is made up of the following items:

Estimated increase in compensation on account of increase in weight of regular mails since last weighing	$3,861,000
Estimated increase on account of parcel post	4,812,000
Estimated cost of 35 days' weighing and tabulation	500,000
Total	9,173,000

According to the Postmaster General's opinion, the enactment of legislation recommended by him and adopted by the Senate would require the Government to pay $9,000,000 more in railway mail pay than was estimated for in the regular annual estimates. According to the conference agreement on amendment No. 26 and the substitute now before the Senate, the Government would pay a maximum of two and a half million dollars. Thus, according to the estimates of the Post Office Department, the Government would save by the enactment of the conference recommendation over six and a half million dollars.

There is a question as to the correctness of the opinion of the Post Office Department, but I would say, for the information of the Senate, that the Postmaster General requested 1,600 of our post offices having carrier service and handling over 76 per cent of all the mails transmitted and handled in the United States, to keep account of all fourth-class mail matter for the first 15 days of 1913 and to report to the Post Office Department, in order that the department might have some idea as to the extent of that service, to enable it to make administrative provisions for handling the increased mail. And upon the same the Post Office Department based its calculation upon the information received from these offices, made its deduction, and sent to Congress these estimates. I have a statement of the returns from 1,597 of the offices. I myself made the computation upon the information from 45 of the largest cities, representing 48 per cent of the total mail matter of the United States. To be sure, this represents only three seventy-thirds of a year; but I think, Mr. President, considerable information can be derived by computation and deduction based on this ascertainment from these different cities on an actual count for the first 15 days of the year. Hence, Mr. President, I think instead of the conferees being submitted to severe criticism, and the inference being left possible in the minds of some of the audience that the conferees have been derelict in their duty, they should be commended for having agreed upon a substitute for the action of the Senate, which, according to the best information available, will save the Government six and one-half million dollars.

In regard to the comments of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] upon the blue-tag system, I am as strongly in accord with the views which he expressed as he himself is. The Senate conferees worked many hours in conference; they protested against the injustice done some of our citizens; and believed that we should rebuke an administrative head who has attempted by his action to discriminate between our citizens. They believed that where citizens pay the same compensation for a service rendered, they are entitled to equal service. But, as I have stated before, Mr. President, it is impossible for the conferees of the Senate to control the conferees of the House, or vice versa.

All that could be accomplished was to secure a further rebuke, inferential, if you please, by the adoption of the last proviso in the conference report instructing the joint committee on postage on second-class mail matter and compensation for the transportation of mail to inquire into "the question of the transportation of second-class mail matter in fast freight trains and the manner of handling incident thereto and report upon the same and the best method of effecting its discontinuance, if such be found advisable."

Our parcel post, so-called, was constructed on a basis that would make a profit to the Government. Personally I am most confident that such will be the result. To repeat, section 8 of the last Post Office appropriation bill, known as the parcel-post law, was constructed on a basis which would make it far more than self-supporting to the Government. For the first zone, where we provided a 5-cent overhead charge, the department estimates a cost of 3 cents overhead charge, thus giving the Government a profit of 66⅔ per cent on the overhead or pick-up and delivery cost. It is estimated—and the estimate is reliable—that it costs the Government 2.58 mills to haul one pound of fourth-class matter 50 miles, while we charge 3 cents, or a profit of 1,100 per cent to the Government. It certainly was not the expectation of Congress that, after charging our citizens a profit of 1,100 per cent in the transportation charge of the first zone, we should pay the transportation companies nothing for that service.

On our second zone, our rate includes 4 cents for the transportation charge and our overhead charge is 5 cents. The transportation cost to the Government on the second zone would be less than a cent, or an actual profit to the Government in the price we charge our citizens of over 300 per cent on the transportation charge. Was it the expectation and intention of Congress that no compensation was to be given to the transportation companies after charging our citizens 300 per cent profit? I do not think so, Mr. President; neither do I think that the conferees should be criticized for their action, but on the contrary strongly commended for what I believe a most favorable settlement, except our inability to secure the discontinuance of the blue tag.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BOURNE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to say that I did not mean in any sense that no compensation should be given to the railroads. The only suggestion I made was that if we waited until the service had been going on for 12 months we could more accurately reach a conclusion as to how much had been done by the parcel post than we can at the end of 30 days. It was not with the idea that the railroads should receive no compensation. In the amendment which I suggested I expressly provided as follows:

That provision may be made to pay for the same.

I want to add now, while I am on the floor, that, while I do not like the plan of undertaking to fix a percentage of compensation until we have gone on through the year, I do not believe that the proposed percentage will be too great, but I think what the conferees have brought back is so much better than what the Senate sent out that I am disposed to withdraw my own objection and to support the action of the conferees, repeating, however, that I do dislike the idea of fixing in advance the compensation before we know more of the service; and, with the opinion of the Postmaster General, I scarcely think there is any danger of the 5 per cent being excessive. I am inclined to believe, with the confidence I have of the use the public will make of the parcel post, that by the end of the year we shall find that it will be more than 5 per cent. I would be willing to take the chances and feel quite sure we would not be losing by it. So I think I shall withdraw my objection, and I think we can really afford to do so. We have expressed our opinion against the plan of fixing a rate in advance, and I still entertain that view; but I am inclined to think we had better take this than to risk getting back into conference and having more of what the Senate placed on the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the chairman of the committee permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BOURNE. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am in hearty accord with what the Senator from Georgia has just said. The only difficulty with me is that I really believe, having entered into a contract with the railroads to give them a certain amount on tonnage for carrying the mails, we shall be doing them an injustice in this 5 per cent increase, because, taking the rate of increase on the parcel post for the few days that they have already estimated it, it will be, in my judgment, nearer $9,000,000 at the end of the weighing period than $2,500,000; and I think, if we are going into the question from the standpoint of economy, taking the 5 per cent increase will be a vast saving to the Government rather than let it run on for 12 months, and then let the law be retroactive, and pay railroads for the increased tonnage during the 12 months.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BOURNE. With pleasure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a very few moments while I endeavor to state the attitude of the conferees on the part of the Senate touching this bill.

I agree with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] that the blue-tag system is an outrage. I do not believe there is any justification for it in morals, in equity, or in any other way; but, Mr. President, it is the law, or at least it is one of the regulations which the Postmaster General has made under the discretion we have given him, and we can not now get away from it. To adopt the views of the Senator from Kansas would mean an addition of a million and a half or two million dollars to the mail pay. Everybody concedes that. I admit that it ought to be paid. I do not believe that the Postmaster General or anybody else has the right to discriminate against publishers of periodicals and require one publisher to send by fast freight and permit another to send by fast mail; but that was the best that we could do. When we conferred with the House conferees about paying the railroads a million and a half dollars more on these publications they came very near jumping out of the window. [Laughter.]

Again, Mr. President, I do not know whether or not the railroads are entitled to 5 per cent because of the additional burdens that have been imposed by the parcel post, but I do know that the Second Assistant Postmaster General, who is a most competent man, who is painstaking in all of his estimates, came before the conferees and stated that the increase would be more than 10 per cent. The Postmaster General, in referring to the reweighing of the mails, said, "If you do, it will add more than $9,000,000 to the present railroad appropriation for the carrying of the mails." We could not get away from that; that is all there was about that. Our associates at the other end of the Capitol would not consent to a weighing at all. They said, "If you do that, you will increase this compensation five, six, seven, eight, nine, or ten million dollars, and we will not stand for it, but we will accept your proposition to add 5 per cent by reason of the cost, by reason of the burden that has been added because of the activities of the parcel post.

The terminal proposition at St. Louis can not be settled in this bill. The conferees have done the best they could.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield to me in order that I may make a motion for the recall of a local bill from the other House to correct an error in it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to do so.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the bill (H. R. 25781) to amend section 77 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, which has been sent from the Senate to the other House, be recalled in order to correct an error in it. It is a local bill applicable to Georgia, and nowhere else, with reference to the holding of a court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that the bill referred to by him be recalled from the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I now desire to enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 27148) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I want to say a word more in connection with this bill and the activities of the Post Office Department.

It must not be forgotten that the Post Office Department is the only department of this Government that pays any part of its expenses; it must not be forgotten that the Post Office Department reaches every man, woman, and child in this country, and they themselves pay for the benefits. It is true that the amount of appropriation in the Post Office bill has been going forward by leaps and bounds. Why? A few years ago the demand from the people of this country was such that Congress was compelled reluctantly to establish a rural-route system in this country. For that purpose we appropriated the first year $10,000 and organized some 300 or 400 miles of rural routes. In this bill we are appropriating $47,000,000 for rural service, and we now have more than 44,000 routes, traversing more than a million miles of road and delivering the mail at the doors of 30,000,000 people.

What followed that, Mr. President? We established the parcel post, which has imposed an additional burden on the Post Office Department and must necessarily add largely to increase the cost of the transportation of the mails. Under the provisions of the law covering the parcel post the service more than pays the expense. It does not cost the Government a cent to transport the parcel-post matter. The people pay for that, and they pay a very high per cent. As stated by the chairman of the committee, in the first zone the profit to the Government is more than 600 per cent. That being so, I can not understand why it is that the Congress of the United States is not willing to deal liberally and justly with the Post Office Department, because they are dealing with the department that reaches all the people of this country.

In 10 years, the way things are going, the appropriations for the Post Office Department will amount to $350,000,000. You can not stop it, and you ought not to stop it. It is the people's department, and they are paying for it. The people are insisting on having a dance, Mr. President, and they are willing to pay the fiddler. That is all there is to that.

That is all I care to say about this bill. If Senators, in their judgment, think it is a bad bill, they need not adopt the report of the committee of conference. In my judgment, it is the best we can get. We tried for three days and nights to bring about an adjustment of the disputed questions, and this is the best compromise that we could make; and all legislation, in the end, Mr. President, is the result of compromise.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BOURNE. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, instead of criticizing the conferees on the part of the Senate, we should, rather, commend them, for they have labored long and faithfully, and a right understanding of their work reveals the fact that they have accomplished much and have secured, on the whole, a most excellent bill. If there be one Senator who has devoted more time and intelligent attention to the work of his committee than has the chairman of the great Committee on Post Offices [Mr. BOURNE], it has not been my good fortune to know of it. Senators may differ on some of the many items in this great measure, but before too severe criticism is indulged the critics should be sure that they understand the true situation.

I feel a good deal as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] does in reference to the 5 per cent provision. The Senate committee did not include this in its report, as it was a difficult matter to determine, but no one can doubt that parcel post will greatly increase the fourth-class mail matter and thereby increase the burden upon the railroads, and good conscience would indicate that the Government should compensate them for this extra work which it places upon them.

The railroads are now carrying the mails under contract with the Government, which contract is based upon mail weights found by weighings at a time before the establishment of the parcel-post system. I can not assume that that contract is unfair. I know it exists and that the Government is a party to it; and, in honor, it must observe its contracts the same as it compels its citizens to observe theirs. It is possible that we are paying the carriers too much. Maybe the Government made a poor bargain. I do not know whether that is true or not. That is a contested question; but I do know that we have placed a great additional burden on the railroads by reason of the parcel post. I think that the 5 per cent additional pay which the conferees have inserted will be far short of what they would be entitled to, based on the last weighing of the mails. In justice to both the railroads and the Government a new weighing should be had, for without that it will be impossible to tell what the Government should pay and what the carrier should receive.

I wish to devote myself for a moment to another provision in the bill; and I do so at the request of the chairman, whose voice is in a bad condition as he is suffering from a very heavy cold to-night. I refer to the provision in reference to the St. Louis Terminal Co. There is something complicated about the history of that company, I admit. I know that it has a charter as a distinct and separate corporation. I also know that the stock is owned by some 14 or 15 roads. I am informed that all roads entering St. Louis from the West end at the west bank of the Mississippi and all roads from the East end at the east bank of that river—their rails do not extend over the bridge; they must use the terminal company's rails. I know also that the organization of this company is such that it can not make money; that is, it can not declare dividends. It can only charge sufficient money to maintain the bridge and pay operating and improvement expenses. It is charged that the Government is paying too much for the use of this company's property in hauling and handling the mails; but here, again, we have a contract, and it was made in 1899. Why attempt to change that contract on an appropriation bill? Would it not be fairer, and therefore better, to proceed formally and in a regular way to change the contract through the introduction and passage of a special bill repealing the act of 1899?

Such a course would permit a full hearing and investigation of the subject, and, instead of proceeding blindly and perhaps unjustly, we could act understandingly. By the way, the contract with this terminal company does not involve simply the carrying of the mail across the river or over the bridge. It means the use of the tunnel on the other side; it means the use of terminal facilities used by the Government, which the department says cost the company something in excess of $60,000 a year. This company, under the law of 1899, is entitled, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, to $50,000 a year. The House bill left this law unchanged. The Senate reduced this amount to $20,000. The conference determined upon an amount between the two and agreed upon $35,000, which seems to me a very good compromise on the part of Congress if we are in a position where we want to take advantage of our contract and of our own law and drive a sharp bargain because we can.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator seems to argue from the standpoint that, on account of the extra cost to the railroads for the use of the property of private individuals to get into St. Louis, the Government should pay that cost. Now, is not this a parallel case? Certain railroads entering New York City at enormous expense have tunneled underneath the river and built a magnificent station in the city. Would they not have the same right, in view of this tremendous additional cost to deliver the mail as they do deliver it now in the city, to come to the Government and demand that they are entitled to extra pay on their contract? Because they have to pay extra to get into St. Louis by using the property of a private corporation must the Government reimburse them? I am speaking upon the assumption that they are to deliver the mail in St. Louis. Now, of course, if the Senator from Kansas——

Mr. TOWNSEND. But the Senator is wrong in his assumption. It is not such a contract as compels the railroads to deliver the mail into St. Louis. The roads end, as I have said, at the banks of the river—those from the West on the west bank and those from the East on the east bank. Some agency must take the mails across the river, and the Government employed the terminal company to do this work.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is the very point that I want to bring out. If their contract should require them to deliver the mail there, all that the Government would stand for would be the same mileage rate into St. Louis that other railroads pay, which is $15,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But, Mr. President, the case is not at all similar to the one in New York. This is a terminal company, the stock of which is now owned by some 14 or 15 roads. There are roads, however, which pass over that bridge from East St. Louis against which the 14 or 15 owners could not assess any part of the loss which would be imposed upon the owning roads if they were compelled to carry the mails at less than the cost of service. I repeat that this company can only charge the users of the bridge a sufficient sum to pay expenses. It is a separate corporation, and our contract with it should be observed or annulled. If the contract is not a good one, if we ought to change it and make the railroads deliver the mail into St. Louis, even though they do not own the bridge, as some of them do not, on a mileage rate, we ought at least to change the law. That should be done by a separate bill. That is what ought to have been done years ago, if it was wrong, as some statesmen have for years contended that it was. Anyway, this is a mooted question and it can be easily settled in the right way.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do; although I do not wish to take any more time. I should like to have a vote.

Mr. BRYAN. I simply desire to say to the Senator that I have introduced such a bill, and it has been favorably reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and is now on the calendar.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very glad of that, because that will settle the question as to whether we are paying too much or not, because there will be a hearing on both sides and we will be able to find out what the true situation is.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I do not believe that the railroads are being imposed upon by the parcel-post law. They are carrying the kind of freight or express matter which the parcel post carries for very much less money for the express companies than they receive from the United States Government for carrying the mail. It is assumed that they have the same right to the same rate for parcel-post matter that they have for high-class mail. To pay the railroads the same rate for carrying merchandise, such as is covered by the parcel post and for first-class mail, would be equivalent to charging the same rate on coal and dry goods. If it is proposed to enter into a readjustment of railway-mail pay—and I think that ought to be done—now is the time to do it. The Postmaster General has said that they are receiving $9,000,000 a year more than they ought to receive.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. I am sure that the Senator does not wish to leave a false impression in the minds of his hearers. I assume that the Senator from Kansas, in his statement as to what the Postmaster General has said, refers to what is known as Document No. 105, in which the Postmaster General, in effect, claimed that by the adoption of his suggested plan, which is the substitution of space for weight as the determining factor as to the value of the service rendered, there would be a difference of $9,000,000 in the railway-mail pay on the present basis.

But subsequently the Postmaster General submitted a second suggested plan, which is before the joint committee on railway mail pay and second-class postage, and which, in his opinion, is more equitable than the original plan he suggested; otherwise he would not send it to the committee with his recommendation. His representative, the Second Assistant Postmaster General, who was chairman of an administrative commission appointed by the Postmaster General to make a study of railway mail pay in the department, the result of which is what is known as document 105, estimated that by allowing 4 per cent on the capital charge of the railroads the Government would have to pay a million dollars more than it is now paying, and by allowing 6 per cent on the capital invested the Government would have to pay some $6,000,000 more than it now pays. So that the committee on railway mail pay having this subject under consideration have from the representatives of the department the statement that its last plan, if they saw fit to recommend and Congress to adopt it, would cost the Government more than what the Government now pays.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not in favor of the plan submitted by the Postmaster General for readjusting the railway mail pay, although it has some good features to it. But not only do we pay the railroads very much more per pound for carrying the mails than the express companies pay, but we also pay them $5,000,000 a year for the rent of cars. We pay them a big price per ton for the mail, and then we rent from them the cars in which this mail is placed. We pay them $5,000,000 annually for the car service.

As I said before, no man can tell what additional weight there will be because of the parcel post. If we are to pay them an additional amount because of the parcel post, we ought to establish some system by which this kind of freight shall be carried and fix the rates that shall be paid. If you fill the cars with freight and pay a mail rate for it, of course you will increase the amount of compensation which the railroads receive. To my mind that is an amazing proposition—to leave the rate for high-class mail where it has been and then move the freight of the country that goes by parcel post, so far as the payment of the railroads is concerned, at the same rate that we pay for mail.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. Does the Senator think that between now and the time of the adjournment of Congress we will have the opportunity of working all that out and putting it into legislation?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not, of course, because Congress is going to adjourn at 12 o'clock to-morrow. This appropriation bill, however, is for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914; and there is time to work out a better system than this between now and when that fiscal year begins.

I wish I could impress upon the Senate the fact that the parcel post—which is freight—is being used as an instrument to increase the railway mail pay according to mail rates. It seems to me the sensible thing to do would be to readjust the railway mail pay and fix the compensation upon a fair basis from the standpoint of justice and equity to the people of the United States, who pay the bills, as well as to the railway companies, that receive the money.

So, instead of this arbitrary increase, I think it would have been better to have followed out the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia—that is, that an account be kept by the department as to the increase in the amount during the year due to the parcel post, and then fix the rate of compensation for this increased freight business from the standpoint of justice and equity to all concerned.

I do not care to prolong the discussion. I am simply entering my protest against increasing the railway mail pay of the United States 5 per cent on what it now is, upon an estimate made from data collected for 12 days in January in 45 or 50 offices in the United States.

As to the magazines—the blue-tag system—there is left to a commission the determination of the best way of adjusting that problem as to the second-class rate. If they can wait for a proper ascertainment of what would be just, why can not the railroads wait for a proper ascertainment as to the increased business that they will have?

It is claimed that we want to do justice to the railways, and that is true. Nobody wants to do an injustice to the railways. Nobody proposes to do an injustice to the railways. What I propose is that we wait until we see what burden—if that term may be used—is placed upon them, and then pay them for the additional work they do from some equitable standpoint.

It is said that the reweighing would cost $500,000, and that the additional weight would entitle the railroads to more pay than they would receive under the present provisions of the bill. That is something that nobody knows. There is an exaggerated idea as to the weight of the parcel post. Nobody can estimate accurately what it will be. I protest against increasing the pay of these companies when the officials of the department declare that they are already paid more than they ought to be, and want a readjustment. I say we should proceed first to the readjustment of the pay without increasing the rate and allowing them mail pay upon the freight business that we have given them.

I hope the conference report will not be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BRISTOW. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Owing to my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28766) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings; to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings; to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings; to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings; and for other purposes; further reports that upon four amendments in dispute the Senate recede from its disagreement on Nos. 203, 217, and 218 and that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 241, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 25. That for the purpose of preventing the pollution and obstruction of Rock Creek and of connecting Potomac Park with the Zoological Park and Rock Creek Park a commission, to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Agriculture, is hereby authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, such land and premises as are not now the property of the United States in the District of Columbia shown on the map on file in the office of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, dated May 17, 1911, and lying on both sides of Rock Creek, including such portion of the creek bed as may be in private ownership, between the Zoological Park and Potomac Park; and the sum of $1,300,000 is hereby authorized to be expended toward the acquirement of such land. That all lands now belonging to the United States or to the District of Columbia lying within the exterior boundaries of the land to be acquired by this act as shown and made a part of the parkway herein authorized to be acquired. One-half of the cost of the said lands shall be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States out of the revenues of the District of Columbia in eight equal annual installments, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon the deferred payments. That should the commission decide to institute condemnation proceedings in order to secure any or all of the land herein authorized to be acquired, such proceedings shall be in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, providing a site for the enlargement of the Government Printing Office (U. S. Stats. L., vol. 26, ch. 837)."

And the Senate agree to the same.

GEORGE SUTHERLAND,
F. E. WARREN,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN L. BURNETT,
FRANK CLARK,
J. E. ANDRUS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WARREN. This is a full agreement?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. Mr. President, I move that the Senate agree to the conference report.

Mr. KERN. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the vote is taken, I desire to speak upon the motion for a moment.

It is commonly assumed, when one rises to speak upon a report of a conference committee at this stage of the session, that it is his purpose to delay a vote upon it. I disclaim any such purpose. I do not want my vote to be recorded against this report, however, without a word of explanation. I am opposed to a public buildings bill——

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. KERN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Lodge	Smith, Ga.
Bourne	Fall	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Foster	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Gallinger	Myers	Smoot
Bristow	Gamble	Nelson	Stephenson
Bryan	Gore	Newlands	Stone
Burton	Gronna	Owen	Sutherland
Catron	Guggenheim	Page	Swanson
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Paynter	Thomas
Clapp	Jones	Penrose	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Pittman	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Poindexter	Warren
Crane	La Follette	Pomerene	Wetmore
Cummins	Lea	Sheppard	Williams
Curtis	Lippitt	Simmons	Works

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 60 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my chief objection to the bill as it now is relates to the modification or change which the conference committee has made in what is generally known as the Kern amendment.

It seems to me that when we are advised, as we have been oftentimes, that the people of this country are not satisfied with the manner in which bills of this character are made up, we ought to do what we can to prove to them they are framed honestly and unselfishly for the public good.

I am not opposed to public buildings erected by the United States throughout the country. On the contrary, I feel that the Federal authorities ought to be liberal in the erection of buildings for Government purposes. But a bill like this necessarily interests and affects almost every locality in the country, and it is natural that those who assemble here in the Congress of the United States are more directly concerned in their own localities than in those that are remote from their residences and their constituencies. The people believe that when we come to make up a public buildings bill the Members are indifferent with regard to its extent, with regard to the amount of money that is appropriated in it, and that they are made indifferent because the demands of their own localities are satisfied, and it is too much to ask of human nature that they judge impartially and fairly of the items in the bill.

I do not know how many items there are in this bill that ought not to be in it. I do not criticize any one of them. I especially do not criticize the committee of conference. But in view of what I have already stated, it seems to me that it is high time that we should seek some other system to regulate our public improvements. We ought to find some way in which a general principle or policy could be enforced without incurring the adverse comment that I have already mentioned.

There is but one way to do it, and that is to prepare and adopt a plan, which we can do, with an eye single to the public good, and then apply the plan to the country, let the buildings go where they may. Then it will be understood by all the men of the United States that we are not trading our votes in order to secure advantages for our own localities. Then it will be understood that we are endeavoring to promote the general welfare and not the development of a particular State or a particular community in which we may be especially concerned.

That thought was uppermost in the minds of all Senators here when the distinguished Senator from Indiana offered the amendment when the bill was upon its passage. As I remember it, the amendment was adopted by a unanimous vote. As I recall it, there was no opposition to it, and there was no opposition because we all saw that this at least was the beginning of a system that might command the approval of the people of the country.

We are asked now in this conference report to say that that is a good principle for other Congresses, but not a good principle for this one. Although it might be useful in the future, and although it would have no legal effect, I do not deny that it might be of value when we come to determine these matters in the future. But even though it might be of some value, there is no reason that can be given for its application to future bills that does not apply to the present bill with equal force.

What do we say to the people of the country, declaring in one breath that hereafter there shall be a limitation upon the location of public buildings throughout the country and that no public building designed for post-office purposes alone should be erected unless the postal receipts were $10,000 per annum, and yet at the very same moment disregarding the principle so far as our present action is concerned?

Mr. President, there are two things that always ought to be present in the minds of men when they come to legislate, indeed in the minds of men in administering any phase of public affairs. The first is to be right. The second is to so do right that the people of the country will know that we are doing right.

One great menace to free institutions in our country is the loss of confidence which people are suffering or feeling in every department of the Government—in our executive department, in our judicial department, and in our legislative department as well. We can not survive a loss of the esteem and the confidence and the respect of the rank and file of the people. While I do not suggest that we ought to pass any law or do anything that we believe to be wrong simply because we may think it to be popular, when we know that a system is wrong and that it has robbed the Congress of the United States of some of the respect and some of the confidence which it ought to enjoy, the time to regain that confidence, to restore the respect, is the moment, and the first moment, in which we are called upon to act.

Senators, it is far better that the public improvement of the United States, in so far as the erection of buildings is concerned, should be arrested for a year or for a few months if we can establish a system that will not only carry forward these improvements as rapidly as they should be carried forward, but at the same time prove to all the people that legislation here is not the result of individual or selfish interest, but is the result of a high regard for the public welfare and the common good.

If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana should remain a part of this bill, then we have proclaimed one rule for future legislation as well as for the present legislation that would go far toward removing from the minds of those who look to us for protection and for government the suspicion that we are not disinterested when we come to weigh the merits of a bill of this character.

I wish the amendment could go much further. I think we ought to pass a law that would provide the conditions under which these public buildings that are intended for a single purpose should be erected. I think we should make this an appropriation that would be used for the purpose of erecting these buildings wherever these conditions are fulfilled, so that the community that had no especial representative here would know that its want, its just demand, would receive the same recognition at the hands of the Government as those communities for which there appeared some special advocate.

Mr. President, I must be candid and say that there are a good many appropriations in this bill for my own State. Some of them, most of them, would come probably within the rule established in the amendment to which I have referred. Some of them would not, and as to them, they ought to share the same fate that the towns in other States would suffer that could not fulfill the requirements of the amendment.

We are about to enter a special session. It will be an easy thing to prepare a public building bill based upon the idea of the amendment. The operations of the Government will not be long deferred, no great interest will suffer; and, knowing as I do the temper, the real desire of the Senators here, it seems to me that we ought to defer the public building bill until it can be framed by the committee, guided by, controlled by the suggestions of this amendment.

I hope, and I hope it earnestly, that this bill will not become a law, notwithstanding the very many excellent features that I know it has. With regard to most of it I have no especial information, and I take it that no Senator here could have special information. I take it that even the committee that reported the bill in the first instance had not and could not have extensive knowledge with regard to all the items that were contained in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. And I am accusing no man of any improper motive. I acquit, and I do it gladly, the Members of the Senate from any intent to gratify their own communities at the expense of the public good; but I indict the bill because it is bottomed upon a false system. We never will present legislation acceptable to the people of this country in either a general buildings enactment or a rivers and harbors enactment until we change the system.

I know the people of the country are not parsimonious. They are not objecting because we spend sufficient money to erect public buildings wherever they are needed. They gladly and willingly approve appropriations that are intended for the improvement of our great inland waterways, as well as our harbors. But what they want to know, and they have a right to know, is that the appropriations are determined not because of a collection of all the interests that may be centered in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, but that they are made after a careful and comprehensive review, and made according to a plan that has been adopted after mature consideration and after intelligent study of the whole subject.

I therefore, Mr. President, will find it impossible to give my assent to this bill, and as reluctantly as I do it, I mean reluctantly in the sense of disappointing some who feel that the bill is right, I shall vote against the adoption of the report.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa and myself have been in the Senate long enough to have discovered that we can not, any of us, have our own way about everything. The so-called Kern amendment was put upon the bill and had my hearty approval. However, we had to deal with gentlemen from the other end of the Capitol who did not agree with the amendment.

The rule proposed by the Kern amendment has never been the rule before. I have heard it stated on the floor that there has been a practice heretofore which confined the erection of buildings to towns where the post-office receipts exceeded $10,000. I have taken some trouble to inquire about that, and I find that it is an entirely erroneous view. There never has been any such practice. There never has been any such understanding. I think it should be the rule; and we have undertaken by the modified amendment to provide, so far as we are able to do it, that it shall be the rule in the future.

This bill went to conference three days ago. We have had three different conferences about it. Twice before it has been reported to the Senate as in disagreement upon several of the items. The Senate conferees have done the very best they could with the Senate amendments which were put upon the bill.

I agree with much that the Senator from Iowa has said. I think we proceed in this public building matter in a rather haphazard fashion, and I think we ought to adopt in the future some definite plan. I think, for example, that we are paying altogether too much for the erection of the buildings in the smaller towns; and much of it arises from the fact that we have no definite and settled plan. If I had my way about it, I would have the Postmaster General and the Supervising Architect together prepare certain definite plans for buildings in the towns throughout the United States of various sizes. There is no reason in the world why there should not be erected in 200 different towns in the United States 200 buildings of exactly the same type. They do not stand side by side so as to offend the artistic sense. They are in different towns and scattered about through the country, and if two of the buildings were exactly alike, as I have said, there could be no objection to it.

It seems to me that if the Postmaster General and the Supervising Architect together were to make plans, for example, that in towns where the receipts are $10,000 per annum a building might be erected that would cost $20,000, in towns where the receipts are $15,000 to cost $30,000, and so on, standard plans and specifications could be devised, so that when we passed a public-building bill instead of getting for one town a building of $60,000 and another town with exactly the same number of people and the same post-office receipts $50,000 we would simply provide that in towns of that amount of post-office receipts we would erect a building of class A costing $20,000 and in another town a building of class B costing $30,000, and in that way we would avoid much of the expense in the architect's office. But those are things that, like the Kern amendment, have not been put into formal shape in the past. They ought to be put into definite shape in the future.

The Kern amendment as modified will serve, I think, a very useful purpose. It is a declaration of Congress in this statute that hereafter no building shall be erected in any town where the post-office receipts are less than $10,000, and that no site shall be authorized in any town where the post-office receipts are less than $6,000. With that upon the statute books the committees in the two Houses will feel bound by it, and bills which do not meet these requirements will not be considered, and we will not be bothered with these questions in the future. But the House conferees took the position that this bill has been framed as bills in the past have always been framed and that there would be hardship and, to some extent, injustice done by making this rule apply to the items in this bill. Those items are not numerous. There are, I think, not to exceed three or four at the outside that were put on by the Senate; just how many were put on in the other House I am not able to say, but compared with the total amount of the bill they are relatively trivial.

As I said in the beginning, we can not have our own way about all these matters. The Senate conferees have done the best they could. We have receded from some of the items, very much to my regret. We have receded from the armory item, which I think was one of the most important items in the bill, but it was necessary to do so in order to agree upon the remainder of the bill. We have receded from an item in which the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is interested—providing for the purchase of a site in the city of New York, amounting to $3,000,000. I think that it is unfortunate that we were compelled to give that up, but we were obliged to do so. We have given up probably altogether something like $8,000,000 of the amendments put on by the Senate. It was absolutely necessary to do so if this legislation was to pass.

There are a vast number of not only important but very necessary provisions in this bill. There is the provision for the erection of the Geological Survey Building, to cost something over $2,000,000, a structure that is absolutely necessary. We have kept in the bill the provision for the acquirement of ground to add to the Rock Creek Park, a very necessary and important item. We have kept in the bill a provision for increasing the limit of cost for the building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the item for the Archives Building, the item for the Patent Office Building, and a large number of others. It seems to me that it would be unwise to permit a bill of this character to fail because there happen to be in it some amendments that everybody does not like or some items in the bill that would be subject to some criticism.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, no Senator on any occasion when this bill was under consideration has attempted to justify or defend its provisions. Some Senators, like the chairman of the committee, have endeavored to excuse certain of its provisions, but I repeat that no single Senator has had the temerity to rise in his place on this floor and declare that this was a good piece of legislation. It is labeled a "public-buildings bill." We would indulge in no extravagant phraseology if we should call it a "public-plunder bill"; and I move, Mr. President, at this time that the report of the conference committee lie on the table, in the hope that at another time, and in the near future, necessary public buildings may be erected and a provision offered devoid of the extravagance and waste which distinguishes this proposed legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the conference report lie on the table. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. KENYON and Mr. O'GORMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], but under my arrangement with him I have authority to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and on that account withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous roll call, and shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I do not see him in the Chamber and I do not think he is among those who are recorded as voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 46, as follows:

So Mr. O'GORMAN's motion to lay on the table was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair feels it incumbent upon him to make a statement to the effect that the motion made by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] was inadvertently entertained by the Chair. The only motion in reference to conference reports is as to whether or not they shall be agreed to. The motion is not amendable, and it has to be direct. The question now is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I have not the strength nor have I the inclination to occupy the time of the Senate to any great extent at this hour of the morning. If I believed that any material interest in this country would suffer by the defeat of this bill, I would interpose no objection to its passage under the circumstances that now surround us, but I can not persuade myself that any such interest would suffer by the postponement of the passage of any such bill as this to some time in the future. A special session of Congress will be called to convene on the 1st of April next, a little less than a month away. Upon to-morrow a new President of the United States will be inaugurated, a man who is pledged to carry out the promises of the Democratic platform. A new Congress will come in. In 60 days from this time every interest that is affected by this bill can be well taken care of and a public buildings bill can be framed on fair, equitable, and just lines. I see no reason for haste in passing this bill, nor do I see any reason for the great interest that is manifested here to-night that it should pass in its present form, which, according to an almost unanimous vote of the Senate taken a few days ago, is objectionable in the extreme.

In my judgment, Mr. President, the measure which we have now before us is the boldest and most audacious raid on the Public Treasury that has been attempted in recent years.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Indiana permit an interruption in order that the action of the House of Representatives on the naval appropriation bill may be laid before the Senate?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28812) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, insisting upon its disagreement to the amendments still in disagreement, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PENROSE. I present the report of the committee of conference on the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28812) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 3, 7, 8, 9, 12, 28, 29, 35, and 37.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 6, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 25, 26, 27, 30, 31, 34, 36, 38, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 51, and 52, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following: "Provided, That the President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint the dentist now at the United States Naval Academy a dental surgeon in the Navy for duty at the United States Naval Academy, to have the corresponding rank, pay, and allowances as the senior dental surgeon now at the United States Military Academy: And provided further, That he shall not be eligible for retirement before he has reached the age of seventy years, except for physical disability incurred in the line of duty"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out and add the following proviso: "Provided, That section 1486 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply in the case of officers who enter the Navy after the passage of this act, and all such officers shall take precedence when of the same grade according to their respective dates of commission in that grade"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On page 3 of the bill, line 25, strike out the word "fifty" and in lieu thereof insert the words "thirty-five."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment after the word "specified" in line 7; strike out the comma and insert a period; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$46,491.95" and insert in lieu thereof "$17,838.28"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "for" strike out the semicolon and insert the word "and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "stations" insert the following: "Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for the purchase of land for sites for radio shore stations shall not exceed $50,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "roadway to hospital, $7,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$42,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$35,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Page 29 of the bill, line 8, strike out "$4,088,945" and in lieu thereof insert "$4,348,945."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In said amendment, in line 16, after the word "service," insert the words "other than temporary service"; in line 28, strike out the word "seventy" and insert the word "sixty-four." Strike out the last proviso in said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out said amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"The President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Nathaniel Matson Terry and William Woolsey Johnson professors in the corps of professors of mathematics in the Navy with the rank of lieutenant as extra numbers not in the line of promotion: Provided, That for pay and other purposes their service as instructors or professors at the United States Naval Academy previous to being commissioned shall count as service in the Navy: Provided further, That for the purpose of this act limitations as to age at the time of appointment shall not apply nor shall age constitute a claim for retirement, and nothing in this act shall operate to create a claim for back pay."

And the Senate agree to the same.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 46, line 12, the following was stricken from the bill in the House on a point of order and, by error, printed in the bill as reported to the Senate, and is therefore stricken out: "and no law shall be construed to entitle marines on shore duty to any rations, or commutation thereof, other than such as now are or hereafter may be allowed enlisted men in the Army."

Strike out all of the second paragraph in said amendment.

Page 51 of the bill, line 6, strike out "$7,557,433.78" and insert "$7,558,233.78."

On amendments 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, and 58 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

BOIES PENROSE,
H. C. LODGE,
J. R. THORNTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

L. P. PADGETT,
GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. I now move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments, agree to the further conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. THORNTON conferees on the part of the Senate.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28766) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings; to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings; to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings; to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings; and for other purposes.

Mr. KERN. The principle upon which this bill was framed and the methods by which it was carried through the other House of Congress are obnoxious in the extreme. Senators on every hand will admit that such principles and such methods are obnoxious. Mr. President, the "pork" in this barrel is of such quality that it "smells to heaven." It has been said by people from my State that the amendment offered by me to this bill will affect one or more buildings proposed in my State. I would oppose this bill if it affected every county and every town in my State, because the bill is wrong.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Indiana has referred to the effect of his amendment upon appropriations proposed to be made in his State. I should like to know whether the Senator has made any effort to determine what would be the effect upon the whole bill in the way of reducing the amount of the appropriation? It has been said here that the amount would be insignificant. I agree with the Senator from Indiana thoroughly in what he has said with respect to this bill. I think it is a kind of legislation that ought to be discountenanced; but if the Senator could give us some idea as to the effect of his amendment I should like to have it.

Mr. KERN. It was stated here the other night by a Senator who claimed to know, that the amendment referred to would affect some 90 of these buildings. If the average for each building were $50,000, it would mean a saving of $4,500,000. If the average cost of each building reached half that amount, it would, of course, save something over $2,000,000; but whether it be much or little, it is the principle involved here to which I am unalterably opposed.

Mr. President, it has not been many years since the people of this country were startled by the announcement that in a few years the expenses of the administration of this Government had doubled, and had reached the enormous amount of a billion dollars a year. I say that people were startled by that announcement. They soon came to know what a billion dollars meant; they began to understand what it meant to take a billion dollars a year out of the earnings of the people for the public purposes involved in the carrying on of the Government; they realized further that that was to be added to the burdens of State taxation, county taxation, township and district taxation; they came to know, sir, that a billion dollars represented nearly the value of the entire corn crop of the country, averaged for a period of 10 years; they came to know that it amounted to twice as much as the entire wheat crop of the country amounted to. The total value of the wheat crop in 1912 was $554,000,000; the total value of the oat crop of the country in that year was $439,000,000; and the total value of all the wheat and all the oats raised in this country in that year was only $994,000,000.

Mr. President, the total capital of all the national banks in the United States is less than a billion dollars. The capital stock and surplus of all the private banks in the United States is only $667,000,000. All the specie and all the legal-tender notes in all the national banks of the United States amount to less than a billion dollars. The total assessed value of all the property of the States of Alabama, California, Georgia, and Iowa amounts to only about four billion dollars. The total assessed value of all the property in the three States of Alabama, Arkansas, and Vermont, added together—the entire property value of those three great States in the Union—amounts to only a billion and eighty-five million dollars, or less than the amount carried by the total supply bills of this year.

I say the people came to know this, and their attention was still further attracted a little later when the distinguished then Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich, the Republican leader upon this floor, declared here that a business man controlling this Government could carry on the Government at an expenditure of $300,000,000 less than it was being carried on for now, with the further declaration that even under the present crude and unscientific system of carrying on the Government there ought to be a saving of a hundred million dollars a year.

My party during all these years has been denouncing the extravagance which led up to this total expenditure of a billion dollars a year. My party has been denouncing that kind of extravagance which takes annually out of the earnings of the people an amount in excess of the value of their wheat and oat crop, an amount in excess of the value of all the taxable property in three great States of the Union. For 30 years I have been upon the stump promising the people that when my party came into power and when the leaders of my party came upon the floor of the Senate and upon the floor of the House of Representatives, their voices should be raised and their votes recorded against that kind of extravagance which bears down so heavily upon a people who are finding it hard to get along in the struggle of life.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. KERN. Yes; I will yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in what the Senator from Indiana has said regarding the promises of economy made by his party. I simply desire to suggest that this bill, of which he complains, originated in the House of Representatives, where his party is in absolute control, and contained, when it came to this Chamber, appropriations amounting to over $25,000,000, while but $8,000,000 has been added in this body; so that, if there is claim to economy, it seems to me that the claim would apply to the Senate and not to the House of Representatives, which is dominated by the Senator's party.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator from Michigan will familiarize himself with the public buildings bill, he will discover that $19,000,000 of appropriations were added by the Republican Senate to the $25,000,000 appropriated by the House bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, Mr. President, in the first instance; but upon reflection, as the Republican Party usually acts, they have determined to cut down the Senate appropriations to a little over $8,000,000; but I have not seen the slightest indication upon the part of the House of Representatives, controlled by the party to which the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from New York belong, to cut down the very scandalous appropriations made by the House of Representatives in this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. KERN. I will yield to either of the Senators, although I believe I can take care of myself. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Occupants of the galleries may not be aware of the fact that there is a rule of the Senate forbidding all demonstrations in the galleries, and it must not be repeated. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KERN. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wanted to suggest to the Senator from New York that the opportunity is still present; and if the Democratic Members on the other side of the Chamber had joined with the Republicans on this side of the Chamber who voted for his motion, he would find a majority against the bill in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. KERN. I am somewhat sorry that the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Wyoming have undertaken to turn this discussion into a political discussion. I am not speaking of this matter from the standpoint of a partisan, I am sure; and I think it is remarkable that because a Democrat speaks upon a supply question and even calls the attention of members of his own party to the pledges that that party has made, Senators on the other side should find any fault with that sort of thing. I think the Republicans are as much interested in the defeat of this bill as are the Democrats; they ought to be. If they will study the last election returns and will read the result they will discover that, after the years of extravagance to which I have referred, the people of this country rose, divided their party in twain, and left them in so pitiable a condition that they only have a call from the Rocky Mountains of Utah, on the one hand, reaching over to the Green Mountains of Vermont, on the other, as the only evidence that there is any Republican Party left at all. [Laughter.] What brought that about? It was brought about by the kind of extravagance to which I have referred and through disregard of the rights and interests of the people which made possible this expenditure of a billion dollars a year.

Let me return to the thread of my discourse. I spoke about this great expenditure and the situation when this Congress commenced. I am finding no fault with the gentlemen of my party at the other end of the Capitol. They found a vastly increased pension burden, for which I am in part responsible. There is nothing political about that. They had to provide for it. They found $22,000,000 had to be raised to meet obligations of the Government incurred in past Congresses. The head of the Appropriations Committee battled valiantly and patriotically against the demands that were made in this and in some other bills; but under the vicious system of which I am complaining this vast amount that was in the bill when it came here found its way in over there. Members of the House of Representatives from my own State came to me and said, "This bill is wrong"; they have come to me and said, "We will give you a public building in your district if you will vote for the bill." Some of them were afraid to refuse that, lest they might be charged with recreancy to the interests of their constituents. That is one of the vicious things to which I referred a while ago when I spoke of the vice that was interwoven all through this bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has made a political argument with reference to this matter.

Mr. KERN. I disclaim any purpose to make a political argument.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has made it, whether that was his purpose or not. Can the Senator tell us the proportion of items put in by the Democratic House of Representatives that would be affected by his amendment, as compared with the items put in by the Senate?

Mr. KERN. I can not. I have had no time to make that kind of a calculation. It was not in my mind to do so.

I regard this bill, as I said a while ago, as wrong in principle. It contains scores of items that are utterly indefensible. Believing that no legitimate interests of this country will suffer by having this bill go over to the special session of Congress, where it can have more careful consideration, I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator that by far the greater part of the items have been put in by the House; that there are only three or four items of buildings put in by the Senate that could be affected by the amendment.

Mr. KERN. I am not criticizing the Senate; neither am I criticizing the House. I am criticizing the bill, and the infamous quality of the bill as I look at it, from my standpoint, regardless of who is responsible for it. It does not help the bill any to say that it was drafted by a Democrat. It does not hurt it any to say that Republicans aided in it. The question here is, Is the principle underlying the bill right or wrong? Are the items and provisions contained in it right or wrong? If the principle of the bill is right, and the bill itself is right, and it is right to support it, we should give it our support conscientiously.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator from Utah, the chairman of the Public Buildings Committee, has just stated that a large proportion of the concededly objectionable features of this bill originated in the House and not in the Senate. That he is in error will be demonstrated by an examination of a single series of appropriations affecting the State of Wyoming, so well represented in this body by Senators, one of whom has participated in this discussion.

In the House bill there were two provisions for the erection of public buildings in Wyoming. In one case, that of the city of Buffalo, in Wyoming, the postal receipts were $5,206, and the appropriation provided for a public building costing $62,500. The only other appropriation originating in the House for the State of Wyoming was for procuring a site in the town of Newcastle, where the postal receipts were $3,973.

When this bill came over to the Senate there were eight additional appropriations inserted, running from $60,000 to $100,000. The populations of these towns where the money of the taxpayers of the country was wasted ran as follows:

The town of Basin has a population of 2,000 people. The public edifice to be erected in that community was to take $75,000 out of the Public Treasury. The post-office receipts amounted to $5,701.

In the city of Buffalo, in that State, there is an appropriation for a public building amounting to $75,000. The population is 3,000 and the postal receipts are $5,206.

In the town of Cody——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will be through in a moment.

In the town of Cody the appropriation asked is $75,000; the postal receipts are $7,000 and the population is 2,000.

In the town of Douglas an appropriation of $100,000 was asked.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. The postal receipts are $7,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I prefer to conclude the statement as I find it in the report of the Senate committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have here the report of the Senate committee recommending these appropriations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I insist upon concluding my statement, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In the town of Green River a public building costing $75,000 is asked, with a population of 1,500 people and with postal receipts slightly in excess of $4,000 a year.

In the town of Newcastle, for a site and building, $75,000 is asked. The population is 2,000, and the postal receipts for an entire year aggregate $3,973.

In passing I may say that at the present time the rental paid for the post office in that town is $240, and yet they would have the Government pay out $75,000 to erect a building where they can procure the necessary accommodations for $240 a year. I ask any Senator in this body, if he were dealing with his own private property, whether he would take $75,000 of his capital to erect a building when he could procure what he needed for the small outlay of $240 a year?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming and Mr. WARREN addressed the Chair.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will conclude in a moment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In the town of Sundance—a town more or less familiar to some of us—with a population said to aggregate 1,000, they have postal receipts amounting to $2,387 for an entire year. Yet an appropriation of $75,000 is asked for Sundance.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Then there is Thermopolis, with a population of 1,700, with postal receipts of $4,900, and with a rental of $469. I ask the chairman of the Public Buildings Committee if I am not reading from the report of the committee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is not reading from the report of the committee.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Was not this document issued by the Senator's committee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know what document the Senator has, but he is not reading from any report of the committee.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will tell the Senator just what it is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator has asked me a question, and I should like to answer it. I have been endeavoring to interrupt the Senator to tell him that he is far afield from the facts in what he has been stating. The items which the Senator has been quoting are not in this bill at all, with the exception of two of them.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Were they not recommended by the Senate committee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are not in the bill and they are not in the report. I suppose what the Senator has is a docket of the committee, simply giving a statement of the bills that were introduced and were before the committee.

Mr. O'GORMAN. And that were reported favorably by the committee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And that were not reported by the committee.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Not reported at all?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are not reported in this bill.

Mr. O'GORMAN. None of the items to which I have referred?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have said to the Senator that two of them are in this bill.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is there not a provision for Sundance, Wyo.?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, sir. Let me answer the Senator——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Has not a site been procured in Sundance?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There has been no site procured in Sundance. The Senator stands up here and makes the statement that there are items in this bill for eight towns in Wyoming. If the Senator had examined the bill, he would know that he is mistaken in making that statement.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am reading from a statement that was issued from the Senator's committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is reading from a committee docket, giving a list of the bills that were introduced and referred to that committee.

Mr. O'GORMAN. And recommended by the Senators from Wyoming?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator ought not to make the statement upon the floor of the Senate that these eight items are in the bill, when the most cursory examination of the bill would disclose that he is mistaken about it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. What items does the Senator say are not in the bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say that the items that are in the bill are Basin and Cody. Those are the only items that were put in.

Mr. O'GORMAN. What is the building that it is proposed to put up at Cody?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I was out when the Senator commenced his remarks. I do not know what he may have said before I came in; but not a single word he has said since I came in is within a mile of what he is aiming at.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am simply reading from this record.

Mr. WARREN. It makes no difference what the Senator is reading from. Not a single one of the towns he has mentioned since I came in here is recognized in the least in this bill. The entire amount carried in the bill for the State of Wyoming, which in acreage is several times as large as the State of New York, is $167,500. If the great State of New York thinks that is too much for Wyoming, I hope the Senator will proceed to show us why. There is nothing in what he is reading.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator from New York thinks the whole bill is vicious.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; because the Senator from New York did not happen to get exactly what he wanted, I suppose.

Mr. O'GORMAN. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from New York base that statement upon any more accurate information than he has been giving to the Senate?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I simply have a record from the Senator's committee, which I assume is accurate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator does not answer my question.

Mr. O'GORMAN. What is the question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have stated to the Senator that the items that he has been reading, with the exception of two of them, were not put in the bill.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator now state that a greater number of the objectionable items originated in the House than were inserted by the Senate committee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is not any doubt about it, Mr. President.

Mr. O'GORMAN. According to the Senator's own declaration, in the State of Wyoming the Senate committee allowed at least two which were objectionable, as were the two allowed by the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think they are objectionable. In the case of Cody, for example, there is not only a post office but there are other governmental offices there.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, since the Senator from New York has seen fit especially to state these alleged facts about Wyoming, I will say to him that from one of these places for which a building is proposed in this bill the Treasury of the United States receives every three months a sum that will more than pay for every site and every building provided in this bill for Wyoming.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. KERN. I yield.

Mr. PAYNTER. I understood the Senator from Indiana to say that he was objecting to this bill on account of infamous provisions in it. Mr. President, if there are infamous provisions in it, necessarily that is the result of infamous conduct on the part of the Senator who put them in there.

Mr. KERN. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYNTER. I do not quite understand that. I do not know whether the Senator wants to insist that the provisions are infamous or not; but I wish to call his attention to the statement he has made.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I desire in this connection to say that I gave, or undertook to give, numerous reasons for voting against the bill. If I used the word "infamous," it was an adjective much stronger than I intended to use. I wanted to convey the idea that divers provisions of the bill are highly objectionable and wrong, atrociously wrong, as against the interests of the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

[Mr. ASHURST addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I have the floor. I desire to say at this point that I think every man in the Senate who knows me understands thoroughly that I have not sought to impute bad motives to any Member of this body, nor have I consciously used any language that was intended to reflect upon the motives or the purposes of any Member of this body. I think that is well understood. If I used the word that has been referred to, it was not used in the sense of reflecting on any man here. That is understood. I was characterizing the nature of the bill, and I was trying to point out the principle underlying the way the bill was formed; that was all.

I do not intend to carry on the discussion much further. I was pointing out, when I was interrupted, that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House used every effort that he could to prevent the passage of this bill, but it came over here. I am not criticizing the men who voted for it over at the other end of the Capitol, because in many instances there was a species of compulsion used to induce their votes. But the bill came here carrying something like $26,000,000, which, added to appropriations previously made, made the appropriations for this year considerably more than a billion dollars.

When these bills came here in the shape they did, carrying those vast amounts, there was deep concern over the fact that the amount to be collected from the people in the ensuing year should so far exceed the amounts of past years of which they had so bitterly complained. So it was hoped that in this body, where it is supposed that there is greater deliberation, where it has been supposed that there is greater conservatism, some way would be found to give the people some measure of relief, to prune down these things, to save to the people some of the money which was threatened to be taken away from them by these vast appropriations. But instead of that the appropriations have been increased, and it is proposed that the burdens shall be made heavier.

I am appealing to the Members of the Senate to-night, and my sole purpose in rising here is to appeal to the Members of the Senate to have in mind in this matter the interests of the people at large; to call their attention to the enormous amount of the appropriations which are going to fasten these burdens upon the people of this country; to appeal to them to postpone this bill until the special session, when the matter can be taken up carefully and worked out in a scientific way so that no injustice will be done in any particular instance.

I could occupy much time here to-night in reading the names of towns which are in this bill, the postal receipts of each town, and the present expense of operating the post offices in those towns, to show that in a score or more instances as a business proposition it looks almost stupid to make these vast appropriations; but I will not do that. I simply desire to call the attention of Members on both sides of the Chamber to the facts I have stated and the reasons for my opposition to this bill, and to appeal to them to let this bill go over, to vote it down here, that it may be taken up in three months from this time, when every demand and every need of the country so far as public buildings are concerned will be fully and amply and well taken care of.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I am very sorry the result of the conference was to strike out from this bill the provision for a great public building in the city of New York, which is the home of both my colleague and myself. I am still more regretful that the result of the conference was to modify the amendment introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] so that it does not apply to this bill, but is to apply only in the future. I dislike to vote for the bill with that amendment so limited, although I think the criticisms upon the bill have been extravagant.

The bill has been scrutinized carefully by a good committee, certainly a very good committee in the Senate, composed of most honest, and honorable, and painstaking, and trustworthy men, in whom I have great confidence. Still, I do not like to vote for the bill with the Kern amendment out. I wish it were there; I think it ought to be there; but the committee could not get it. I am going to vote for the bill, however, because of the many good things that are in it—many good things for the benefit of all the people of the United States, and in respect of their Government here in their Capital City.

I think, sir, that it is little less than criminal for us to go on without doing something like we have provided in this bill in regard to the treatment of lower Rock Creek, cesspool and pesthole as it is. I think it is our duty to do what we do in this bill regarding a Hall of Archives, so that we shall not meet the fate that we met in my own State, where a fire in the State Capitol destroyed documents of inestimable value. I think sound business judgment requires us to do what we are doing in this bill about a building for the Geological Survey—a modern business building—to take that great work out of the inadequate rented buildings where it is now housed.

There are a considerable number of other provisions in this bill for the benefit of the Government. The main part of what the Senate has done to the bill has been these provisions for the benefit of the Government and the people of the United States, and because of them I am going to vote for the bill. I think they far overbalance any just criticism that can be made against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in the early history of the country, when the pioneers were settling the timbered West, they used to help one another out. One would say, "I will come over and help you put up your log house, and you and your sons can come over and help me put up mine." The phrase "logrolling" originated on that account. It was useful for the early settlers. It is very pernicious in legislation.

There is not a bill that comes before the House or the Senate where the principle of logrolling is involved that is not pernicious in a great many of its items. We ought to stop this business of omnibus pension bills, omnibus claims bills, omnibus public building bills, and all other bills where you take A's bill and tack it on B's bill and tack them on C's and D's, and thereby obtain the support of A, B, C, and D. You will never have a proper system with regard to either pension claims or war claims or public buildings until you make each bill stand on its own bottom.

Now, what is the spectacle we have witnessed here to-night, in which men have lost their tempers, because men always lose their tempers whenever some private end is about to be balked? What is this spectacle? Gentlemen upon that side of the Chamber and gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber, admitting extravagance and wrong principle as underlying this bill, and each trying to stand out from under it as a party and to lay the blame upon the other, stand here a majority on each side of this Chamber supporting this bill, and yet on each side of the Chamber charging the other side with the viciousness of it, the extravagance of it, and the wrong principle of it.

Now, there is no one of us who does not know that there are a great many projects upon this bill that never could have gotten upon it, and after they had gotten upon it never could have passed, except upon the log-rolling principle. That is what is vicious about this measure. As to the other matters to which the Senator from New York referred—great public buildings that are needed for great public purposes—nobody who was not parsimonious and foolish would object to them. But they are made to carry through a whole lot of other things. The Senator from New York may vote with you to help do it by the fact that great and important buildings for great and important purposes are tacked to the others, and he can not get them without voting for the others. I take exactly the opposite view. If I can not dispense with the unworthy projects upon this bill without dispensing with the worthy ones, I will dispense with the worthy ones and trust to the good sense of the two Houses later on to remedy the evil.

It is very unfortunate that to-night anything of a partisan character could have been said about the bill as was said upon both sides. So far as my 20 years of public experience are concerned, logrolling is bipartisan. I do not call it graft, because logrolling is an ancient and respected custom. No man has a right to charge anybody with any corruption on account of it. It is a legislative custom, and whatever is old in years to man is godlike, somehow. But this is one of the things that is old in years that ought not to be godlike. Logrolling, like all meeting-together forces for the purpose of running things, is essentially bipartisan and has been in this country for a long while.

I wished to make these few remarks because I did not want to be understood as charging anybody upon that side of the Chamber any more than charging ourselves with this wrong custom. Hence it is that nobody is chargeable for it. We found it existing. It grew up first out of the necessities of the pension system. Hundreds of private pension bills were introduced. It was difficult to get them through, and then after a while men said, "Let us put them all in an omnibus pension bill," and I have seen them passed in 5 to 10 minutes. Then the other side said, "Well, if you are going to do that with pensions, here are these southern war claims, which are just and ought to be paid; here are 200 Members who have introduced private claims bills; let us put them in an omnibus claims bill"; and thereupon the weak bills, just as in the pension case, were welded with the good bills and enough votes gotten to pass the whole big omnibus bill. Then you undertook to apply it to public buildings, where there is less excuse for it than in any of the other cases. We ought to stop it.

In my opinion this particular bill ought not to pass. I said so when we were discussing it once before. I think it would be well for us to move as a substitute for it the first great supply bill necessary for the existence of the Government whenever it comes in here, because by 12 o'clock to-morrow they must be passed, and it does not make much difference whether this bill is passed or not. The good features of it can be reenacted or we can start out on a new plan, as I hope we will, and make every public building bill stand upon its own merit, as ought to be the case.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I presume when debate has ended this bill will in all probability pass. What has been said in opposition to it can be said with reference to almost every one of the supply bills that have come before the Senate for consideration. What has been said by the Senator from Mississippi, I think, is especially applicable to most of them.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has criticized what he calls the system behind a bill of this sort. To my mind there is no system behind it except that which may be represented by what I shall call a community of interest. What it needs is some system, and I hope that hereafter, as he states, there will be some basis, if not that of the Senator from Indiana, some other.

It has been said that this is supposedly a conservative body, that is to say, that we deliberate much more largely than is possible in the House of Representatives, and hence it is perfectly proper and natural that the vast body of the people should look to the Senate of the United States to exercise that conservative influence toward the decrease instead of the increase of public expenditures. I think I can say without the slightest hesitation that not a single one of these supply bills has come to the Senate that has not been sent back after it has been largely increased here. I make that statement in no spirit of criticism, I merely state a fact, something for which this Senate is no more responsible than many of its immediate predecessors.

The conference committees that are now out have largely to do with additions made to the bills here. Take the naval appropriation bill, for example. The House proposed to build one battleship, which must cost somewhere over $16,000,000. The Senate demands two battleships, which will cost something over $32,000,000, and that in the face of the fact that we have five already that are uncompleted and are short 300 officers and 6,000 men to properly equip and man those which we have completed heretofore.

I know that there is no system there, but when I made, or attempted to make, a motion instructing our own members of the conference committee, if you please, not the committee itself, whereby they could be authorized to recede from this addition provided the Senate were so disposed, we were met first with an objection that it was out of order—that is to say, because of some musty precedent made some time ago and read into the RECORD we were not able, as a large business organization equipped with one-half of the legislative power of this country, to instruct our own members of the committee what we would like to have them do. Rules of course must exist in all deliberative bodies if we are going to make any progress whatever, but rules of that sort are not designed to promote but to prevent legislation, and seem to be used most effectively in the expiring hours of this session.

I will not call it an argument, and yet perhaps it was, but the only position that seemed tenable with reference to that little episode of some hours ago was that the Senate had by a large majority expressed itself in favor of this additional expenditure of sixteen to eighteen million dollars, and it did not comport with our dignity to withdraw it or to give any such instructions. Sometimes this body is long on dignity and perhaps a little short on proper methods of business procedure.

But I deny, Mr. President, because this body by a large majority is in support of or against a particular measure that that is any reason whatever for supposing that it is right. This body by a large majority was for a long time opposed to a bill providing for the valuation of railroad property. My distinguished friend, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], for a long time spoke to empty seats upon the floor of this body. He endured obloquy, derision, social and political ostracism because of his advocacy of one of the greatest measures that was ever written into the statute books of the country, and the other day he saw it enacted into law without a dissenting voice. In this body at least where is the great majority of the Senate which once expressed itself with so much dignity against that measure?

The great majority of the Senate for some time, for thirty-odd years, was opposed to the principle of electing Senators by direct vote of the people. It took a long time to obtain a hearing upon such a proposition. But to-day it is within a few States of being embodied in the Constitution, and that majority against those two measures has disappeared. We are no longer against these things; we are under them. Some time ago there was a majority, and a large one, in this Chamber in favor of the Payne-Aldrich bill. That is something else that a great political party is now under.

I have no doubt that this bill will pass by such a majority, and that the others when they come will command similar ones. But, Mr. President, I indulge the hope that the time has come—not that it is coming, but the time has come—when different methods will prevail and a different system of legislation will obtain. The light will break in the east to-morrow morning, and the old order is changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate on this bill, but I do want to point out my objection to it, which I will do in five minutes.

The vice of the bill is that there are very many items on it which are more particularly designed to serve small localities where the general welfare does not require a public building, and so a large part of the expenditure is not really inspired and controlled by the public welfare. Our whole country is going through a change of opinion, Democrats and Republicans alike. Our people are beginning to consider more fully processes of government.

I simply desire to put in the RECORD my objection to this bill, just as I objected to the rivers and harbors bill, which was not, as I understood it and take it, moved by the general public interest alone, but was moved largely by mere local interest. Two years ago I made a protest on the same ground against the rivers and harbors bill when the previous bill passed. I renewed it this time. I insisted upon the Senate voting upon a proposal that the President might return to Congress any item on the bill which was not justified in the public interest; in other words, that he might exercise by a legislative act substantially the right of veto upon any of these items, and in that way do away with the vice of cohering a large number of private interests, so as to pass through a bill containing many items of this kind which were not properly moved by the national interests. There has been going on in our country for a year or two a very careful examination in regard to questions of economy and efficiency by the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency, Mr. Frederick A. Cleveland, Mr. W. W. Warwick, and Mr. M. O. Chance, commissioners.

They have made a report to Congress upon the question of economy and efficiency. I do not believe that any Member of the Senate or of the House has seriously considered the report made to us by the Economy and Efficiency Commission, but we simply go on ignoring the very work we have done in the interest of scientific legislation and pass these bills that are derisively called throughout the country pork-barrel bills. I greatly regret to have the country regard bills passing through the Senate as pork-barrel bills. I think the term is to a certain extent unjust. There are many things in this public buildings bill that I very strongly approve of, particularly the Rock Creek provision for the park here in the National Capital. There are many items of that kind that I approve of, and that I should like to see the law.

I merely wanted to call to the attention of the Senate and put in the RECORD, and I shall be content not to detain the Senate, the declaration of this commission with regard to the river and harbor bill as to what we ought to do in that way. In the summary of proposed changes in law, setting forth what legislation it is thought should be enacted in order to enable the administration to transact public business with greater economy and efficiency with regard to rivers and harbors the commission propose—

> The enactment of legislation which will require that before any new projects for river and harbor improvement are adopted, and before any additional contributions are made for the purpose of developing canals, roads, or other transportation facilities, a definite plan shall be submitted and approved by Congress, pursuant to which all authorizations, appropriations, or contracts for new improvements or developments of this kind shall be granted or made; and in such an act it is recommended that there be stated the conditions under which the Federal Government will contribute to transportation enterprises to be carried on by municipal and State authorities.

And so, with regard to public buildings, the commission propose—

> The enactment of legislation requiring that before an authorization, appropriation, or contract shall be made or entered into for any new public building a comprehensive plan for Government housing shall be approved by the Congress in a separate bill, which shall govern its location and the conditions under which it shall be erected, and that thereafter any authorization, appropriation, or contract which may be made or entered into shall be in accordance with such plan or in accordance with an authorized modification of the same, and among the conditions precedent to such action as set forth in the act would be a statement of the minimum of population of a city in which public buildings shall be constructed, the minimum average rentals for a given number of years which the Government is required to pay before an authorization may be given, the maximum of expenditures as determined by a minimum rate of capitalization of average rentals, and the circumstances or conditions under which the Government would undertake to contribute to buildings which are used jointly for municipal, State, and Federal purposes.

I was hopeful that these principles might be put into effect in the river and harbor bill which we just passed and in the public buildings bill which we are about to pass. It was in the line of that suggestion that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] proposed the amendment which has now been practically stricken out of the bill, and which I think is much to be regretted. I do not wish to be understood as criticizing the committee of the House or the committee of the Senate, either; we are all moved by habit and custom and practice, myself quite as much as any other Member of this body and, perhaps, even more so; and it is true that under the old customs with regard to rivers and harbors and the public-buildings bill and the sundry civil bill for that matter and the Indian appropriation bill a Senator is almost regarded as having the right to come in and ask something out of the bill as his part of what is going on.

I remember when the tariff bill was up an appeal was made to me as a Senator from Oklahoma that I might as well get my part out of it while the thing was going, and I did actually vote to put 15 per cent on oil because my State was engaged in the oil business, producing some 50,000,000 barrels a year. It was pointed out to me that it would save our producers down there $7,000,000, and I was induced to make the fatal blunder of giving my support to that item, and to that extent at least contributing to the system of an individual interest against the general welfare. That is the vice of all these bills. It is the cohering of the individual interest in such numbers as to ignore the general welfare and producing vicious legislation along those lines. The time has come to end it, and I say now here in the Senate that there never will be passed through this body again a pork-barrel bill either for rivers and harbors or for public buildings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CUSTOMS SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

The message is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Whereas by virtue of the provision of chapter 355 of the acts of 1912, approved August 24, 1912, being "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," I was authorized to reorganize the customs service and cause estimates to be submitted therefor on account of the fiscal year 1914, reducing the total cost of said service for said fiscal year by an amount not less than $350,000, and I was further authorized in making such reorganization and reduction in expenses to abolish or consolidate collection districts, ports and subports of entry and delivery, to discontinue needless offices and employments, to reduce excessive rates of compensation below amounts fixed by law or Executive order, and to do all such other and further things that in my judgment may be necessary to make such reorganization effective and within the said limit of cost; and

Whereas it was further provided that such reorganization should be communicated to Congress at its next regular session and should constitute for the fiscal year 1914, and until otherwise provided by Congress, the permanent organization of the customs service: Now therefore

It is hereby ordered and communicated that the following plan shall be the organization of the customs service for the said fiscal year 1914, and unless otherwise provided by Congress the permanent organization of the customs service:

I.

Such fee shall be deposited and accounted for as "Miscellaneous receipts," and in case the notice of dissatisfaction or protest in connection with which such fee was deposited shall be finally sustained in whole or in part, such fee shall be refunded to the importer, with the duties found to be collected in excess, from the appropriation for the refund to importers of excess of deposits.

REGULATION OF THE WATERS OF NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, will the Chair lay before the Senate the concurrent resolution which has just come over from the House of Representatives, giving authority to the Committee on the Judiciary of that body to employ certain assistants?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first lay before the Senate a joint resolution previously coming from the other House.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 402) extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that joint resolution.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I reluctantly object to unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. BURTON. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration, notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CHILTON. Had it not better be read, Mr. President? We do not know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 402) extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes, was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes," approved June 29, 1906, be, and they are hereby, extended and reenacted from March 4, 1913, being the date of the expiration of the operation of said act, to March 4, 1914: Provided, That the first proviso in section 2 of said act limiting the transmission of electrical power from the Dominion of Canada into the United States to 160,000 horsepower be amended by striking out the words "one hundred and sixty thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two hundred and fifty thousand."

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I hope this joint resolution——

Mr. BURTON. I take it, Mr. President, that the motion to proceed to the consideration of a measure is not debatable; but in answer to the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is usually held that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. BURTON. But the Senator from New York having made a brief statement, I think I am also entitled to do so.

I regard the passage of this joint resolution as extremely important. In the language of the Chief of Engineers the situation will be more or less chaotic, unless the joint resolution passes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not considered debatable. The Senator from Ohio moves to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution just read. [Putting the question.]

Mr. O'GORMAN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Perhaps I am under a misapprehension. Will the Secretary state the precise motion that was made by the Senator from Ohio?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state it. The motion was, that the Senate should proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution which had been read, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from New York. The question is on agreeing to the motion. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I call for a division.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, is the question on the appeal or on the joint resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that the Senator from New York withdrew the appeal.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 26, noes 16.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The division discloses the lack of a quorum, and the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clarke, Ark.	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Bourne	Dillingham	Myers	Stephenson
Bradley	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Stone
Brady	Gamble	Owen	Sutherland
Brandegee	Gore	Page	Thomas
Bristow	Johnson, Me.	Paynter	Thornton
Bryan	Jones	Penrose	Warren
Burton	Kavanaugh	Pittman	Wetmore
Catron	Kern	Poindexter	Williams
Chamberlain	La Follette	Pomerene	Works
Chilton	Lea	Root
Clapp	Lippitt	Sheppard
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Simmons

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 53 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is——

Mr. BURTON. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President, on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the occupant of the chair to Rule VIII, which provides that all motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate. As this motion does not fall within that class, the motion to proceed to the consideration of a matter evidently permits discussion. I invite the attention of the Chair to Rule VIII.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is after 2 o'clock.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I think everybody will agree that while there is no designation the mention of an hour means post meridian. It is now several hours before the 2 o'clock which naturally, and I think logically, is referred to in the rule.

Mr. O'GORMAN. We are still in the legislative day of March 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule manifestly applies when the Senate meets in the morning and has a morning hour, and the motion made before 2 o'clock on such a day is to be determined without debate; but the Chair will have to ask some one to count up the particular portion of the day in which we are now legislating, the Senate having met at nearly 3 o'clock in the afternoon, as the Chair understands.

Mr. O'GORMAN. At 3 o'clock?

Mr. SMOOT. It was 10 minutes to 3.

Mr. O'GORMAN. We met on March 3. We are in the legislative day of March 3, although we are now in the calendar day of March 4.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the 3d and 4th of March, with one exception, have always been treated as one legislative day, and that proceedings on the 4th day of March were merely a continuation of the proceedings on the 3d.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28812) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28775) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25781) to amend section 77 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 7747) for the relief of Charles Dudley Daly.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28766) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Half an hour or more ago I asked unanimous consent from the Senate to recall the bill (H. R. 25781) to amend section 77 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, which is a local bill, applying alone to the State of Georgia. I did so because in the House it is found that two words were left in it by mistake that nullified the effect of the bill. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to correct those two words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the House print, page 1, line 6, I move to strike out the words "to read"; in the Senate amendment, on page 1, in the first line, I move to strike out the comma before the word "after," and to strike out the lower-case "a" and insert a capital "A."

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the naval bill is on the table, I would ask to have it submitted. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28812) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senate has already agreed to all of the amendments in the naval appropriation bill, with the exception of three or four, all of which are applicable to the battleship question. The conferees have recently met and have agreed on one battleship to be built in a Government navy yard, and I have the report here, in which I ask the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. ROOT. May I ask the Senator if he will state what was the action of the House of Representatives with regard to the battleships?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I ought to state that the House, by a majority of 24, sustained the position of the House conferees for one battleship and defeated the amendment of the Senate for two battleships. So, rather than take the responsibility of defeating the bill, which contains many very excellent provisions for the benefit of the Navy Department and the Navy, the Senate conferees, with great reluctance, have agreed to the one-battleship proposition. I ask for a vote on the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. PENROSE. It is not necessary to read it, unless the Senate wants it read. It only covers the battleship issue. The amendments are five in number, purely technical. Of course they can be read, if desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless some Senator demands it, the conference report will be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28812) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 46, 47, 48, 49, 53, 54, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In said amendment in line 3 strike out the words "one of the battleships" and in lieu thereof insert the words "the battleship"; and the Senate agreed to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$21,768,228" and in lieu thereof insert "$19,818,228"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$490,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$430,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$15,618,912" and in lieu thereof insert "$11,724,192"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreeemnt to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$41,230,416" and in lieu thereof insert "$35,325,695"; and the Senate agree to the same.

BOIES PENROSE,
H. C. LODGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

L. P. PADGETT,
A. W. GREGG,
GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I submit a conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming presents a conference report, which will be read.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say that it is probably unnecessary to read the report, unless it is asked for. I will say that the conferees have agreed upon all the items but one, and that one has been acted on in the House, and I am informed they voted to adhere to their disagreement. The mover of the amendment in the Senate, who is not in the Chamber at present, knowing of the vote in the House, expects me to move to recede from that one amendment and thereby close the consideration of the sundry civil bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with and that it be printed in full in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28775) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 8, 9, 16, 20, 21, 22, 23, 28, 50, 55, 58, 59, 62, 63, 67, 83, 84, 101, and 103.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 19, 47, 68, 70, 71, 94, 95, 96, 100, 102, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$75,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,305,520"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 64, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter inserted by said amendment and in lieu of the sum proposed insert "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to grant a lease for the construction and maintenance of a substantial hotel and buildings in connection therewith in accordance with and under the provisions of the act of June 4, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 207), relating to concessions in Yellowstone National Park, and the act of March 2, 1907 (34 Stat. L., p. 1219), amendatory thereof, and any part of section 2 of the act of October 1, 1890, concerning the Yosemite National Park, in conflict herewith is hereby repealed"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$125,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter inserted by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 129, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"To provide for the participtation of the United States in the Panama-Pacific International Exposition.

"There shall be exhibited at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, to be held at San Francisco in 1915, such articles and materials as illustrate the function and administrative faculty of the Government of the United States tending to demonstrate the nature and growth of our institutions, their adaptation to the wants of the people, and the progress of the Nation in the arts of peace and war; and the President is authorized to provide for the collection and exhibition of such articles and materials under the direction of a board, which is hereby created, to be known as the Government Exhibit Board, which shall be composed of three members, to be named by the President from persons in the executive departments, who after consultation with the heads of the executive departments and the regents of the Smithsonian Institution, the Isthmian Canal Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Civil Service Commission, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the American National Red Cross, the Commission of Fine Arts, the Librarian of Congress, the Public Printer, the governor of Porto Rico, the governor of Alaska, the governor of Hawaii, and the United States Geographic Board, shall determine the nature, character, and extent of the exhibits to be made, and shall be charged with the selection, purchase, preparation, safe-keeping, exhibition, and return of such articles and materials as said board may decide shall be exhibited. Before any obligations are incurred of any nature said board shall have arranged the scope of such exhibits so as to provide for the collection, exhibition, and return of such articles and materials at a cost, which, together with all other expenses herein authorized, shall not exceed the amount hereinafter appropriated. All officers and employees of the Government who may be detailed as aforesaid shall receive no compensation in addition to their regular salaries, but shall be allowed their actual and necessary traveling expenses, together with a per diem in lieu of subsistence, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but in no case to exceed $5 per day while necessarily absent from their homes engaged upon the business of the board. Any officer of the Army or Navy so detailed shall receive this allowance in lieu of the transportation and mileage now allowed him by law. Any provision of law which may prohibit the detail of persons in the employ of the United States to other service than that which they customarily perform, shall not apply to persons detailed to duty in connection with said Panama-Pacific International Exposition. Employees of the board not otherwise employed by the Government shall be entitled to such compensation as the board may determine: Provided, That compensation shall not be paid to any such employee at a rate in excess of $3,000 per annum. The disbursing officer shall give bond in the sum of $30,000 for the faithful performance of his duties, said bond to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall advance to said officer, from time to time, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, a sum of money from the appropriation herein made for the governmental participation in the exposition, not exceeding at any one time the penalty of his bond, to enable him to pay the expenses of exhibition as authorized by the exhibit board.

"Suitable buildings for the housing of all said exhibits shall be provided by the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. without expense of any kind to the Government of the United States.

Said commissioners may appoint a secretary, at $2,500 per annum, and the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended for clerical, office, and other necessary and actual expenses of said commission.

"Said commission shall be authorized and empowered to act as a board of arbitration to settle and determine any and all disputes arising between the commissioners of foreign Governments and the directors of said Panama-Pacific International Exposition whenever a formal request for such action is made by any foreign commissioner, and said National Exposition Commission shall represent the Government of the United States at said exposition in the reception and care of persons officially representing foreign Governments.

"Said National Exposition Commissioners shall be detailed not earlier than July 1, 1914, and their term of service as said commissioners shall not extend beyond July 1, 1916, and the President may terminate said commission at any time after January 1, 1916."

And the Senate agree to the same.

On amendment numbered 130 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

F. E. WARREN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
B. R. TILLMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
SWAGAR SHERLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WARREN. In view of the action taken by the House on the appropriation of $250,000 for the Knoxville Exposition, I now move that the Senate recede from their amendment in that particular.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will first be upon agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming now moves that the Senate recede from the amendment which the Secretary will state.

Mr. WARREN. It is the last amendment in the bill, and carries $250,000 for the Knoxville Exposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is amendment numbered 130. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming that the Senate recede from its amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, before passing on the point of order on the question submitted, I ask unanimous consent to have laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution just received from the House of Representatives. (H. Con. Res. 73.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the managers on the part of the two Houses be authorized and directed to insert in H. R. 28858, "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913 and for prior years, and for other purposes," the following:

"After March 4, 1913, those members of the Committee on the Judiciary who are Members elect of the House to the Sixty-third Congress, or a majority of them, until the meeting of the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, and the Committee on the Judiciary during the first session of that Congress, are authorized to expend for experts, accountants, and clerical and other assistants for the purposes stated in House resolution 486, out of the contingent fund of the House, a sum not in excess of the balance unexpended under said resolution."

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am advised that there is urgent and pressing need for the adoption of the concurrent resolution. I ask for its favorable consideration by the Senate.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

REGULATION OF THE WATERS OF NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, House joint resolution 402 was before the Senate, and I asked for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] raised the point of order that a motion made after 2 o'clock—that is, after two hours from the time the Senate convenes—is a debatable motion. The Chair has not time, under the circumstances, to go through the precedents on that point, but will simply say that, so far as the present occupant of the chair is concerned, a motion to proceed to the consideration of any matter has not been considered a debatable motion.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if the Chair will pardon me, Rule VII, paragraph 6, on page 10, reads as follows:

6. The Presiding Officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did lay the matter before the Senate, and objection was made to its consideration. Then a motion was made to proceed to its consideration, and the Senator from New York made the point of order that the motion is debatable under the rules. The Chair will be pleased to hear Senators who desire to express their views as to whether or not the point of order is well taken.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I do not care whether the debate precedes the vote or succeeds it, but it seems to me the rule is perfectly clear on this point—that the motion must be placed before the Senate without debate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, is the expression that the Chair "may at any time * * * lay before the Senate any bill or other matter" equivalent to a motion to proceed to its consideration?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is to lay it before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was laid before the Senate by the Chair, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] asked unanimous consent to proceed to its consideration, which was objected to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is a different proposition from laying it before the Senate, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Absolutely; the Chair so recognizes. Then the Senator from Ohio moved to proceed to its consideration, whereupon the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], reading the latter paragraph of Rule VIII, insisted that it was a debatable question. The Chair never has known that point to be raised when a motion has been made to proceed to the consideration of a bill; and the Chair must ask time to look up the precedents.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I very much regret to note that there has been apparently a partisan division on this motion. This joint resolution passed the House of Representatives a day or two ago by a unanimous vote. Members of the House of Representatives living in the State of New York, who had made objections to it because they felt that jurisdiction should be exercised by the State, waived those objections and acquiesced in the passage of the joint resolution.

Action on this measure is absolutely necessary, Mr. President and Senators, for the proper preservation of Niagara Falls. This subject has been repeatedly before the House and the Senate. This act was passed originally in 1906 and has been twice extended. The second extension expires on this very day.

In regard to the situation Gen. Bixby, the Chief of Engineers, having in charge subjects relating to the Falls, very recently made this report:

Unless the act in question is extended or replaced by like legislation the question of the control over water diversion and power development at Niagara Falls will be left in a state more or less chaotic. If the act expires by limitation it is probable that all permits granted thereunder will immediately terminate. At any rate, the War Department will find it difficult, if not impossible, to exercise any control over such permits or over the disposition of any unused or unallotted water power; and no executive will be specifically charged with the duty of supervising the use of water for power development on the American side or the transmission of electrical power from or to Canada.

The object to be gained, as I have stated, was to secure the rights of the United States in this boundary stream and also to preserve Niagara Falls. An act, which was passed in the year 1906, to which I have referred, provided that the 15,600 cubic feet per second might be diverted and that 160,000 electrical horsepower might be transmitted into the United States from Canada. That limitation has existed up to this time. Four years later, in 1910, in pursuance of this original act, a treaty was made with Great Britain, under which authority was granted to divert 20,000 cubic feet on our side of the Niagara River and 36,000 feet on the Canadian side. There have been reports made by the engineers to the effect that even the diversion of 15,600 cubic feet materially interferes with the beauty of the cataract. On this subject a report is contained in volume 1 of the Report of the Chief of Engineers, 1909, in which it is said:

The combined lowering tends to uncover shallow portions of the crest line of the American Falls. It is further accompanied by greater and consequently more harmful effects both in the American rapids and at the easterly or Terrapin Point end of the Horseshoe Falls.

Terrapin Point is on the New York side of the boundary, and as depths there are naturally slight, the loss of 2.5 inches in depth, which is the total due to all existing diversions, is a matter of moment in its relation to continuity of crest line. But it is on the Canadian side of the boundary that the impairment of the falls is most serious.

Then follows a discussion of the serious effect of the diversion on the crest line.

I want to read just a few words from an address delivered by a man very highly respected in the United States—Ambassador Bryce. The language I read is from an address on "National parks; the need of the future," delivered before the annual meeting of the American Civic Association, at Baltimore, November 20, 1912:

And, lastly, there is the question of water power, which has in recent years, since the scientific discoveries enabled it to be applied in the form of electricity, become an asset of great commercial value. You fortunately have a great supply of splendid water power. I am far from saying that a great deal of it, perhaps most of it, may not be very properly used for industrial purposes, but I do say that it has been used in some places to the detriment, and even to the ruin, of scenery. It has been used in Niagara, for instance, to such an extent as to change completely the character of what was once the most beautiful waterfall landscape in the whole world. Those of you who did not see it, as I did, 42 years ago, and are not in a position to contrast it now with what it was then, can not know what a wretched shadow of its former self it has become—not so much by the diminution of the flow of the river as by the hideous erections which line the shores. It is not too late to repair what has been done, and I hope the day will come when the pristine flow of its waters will be restored and when the devastating agencies will have been removed. That we will leave for a future which has begun to appreciate scenery more highly than men did 30 years ago, when the ruin of which I speak was beginning to be wrought.

Mr. President, to my mind it is unthinkable that we should neglect this great spectacle of nature, the finest in the New World, which belongs not merely to the State of New York or to the United States but to the whole world—a marvel of beauty and grandeur far exceeding any one of the seven wonders of the world. But the ruthless hand of the promoter has been laid upon this river; and thus the cataract has been diminished in size and the scenic effect has been impaired, not only by diminishing the flow and the quantity of the water but by the structures on the banks. Franchises were given in the State of New York to use this water. They are not to blame, perhaps. At first this development was approved, but it was found necessary for the Federal Government to take control. It was found necessary to settle this question by a treaty with Canada.

I want to say, Mr. President, that in all my experience in either House of Congress I have never known such an aggregation of persons to come here seeking to rob and to despoil as those who have come here after this power. If there is anyone who wishes them to succeed, he must answer to the country for it. They not only desired the water above the Falls but they now desire to withdraw the waters below in the rapids, which are second in beauty only to the Falls themselves. Persons have come here under the guise of public spirit, or even of philanthropy, when it was but a thin veil to conceal a scheme to get possession of the waters of the Niagara River.

We ask that for a year this law be continued to stay the hand of the despoiler.

Repeated efforts have been made to adjust this matter by statute, to turn over a certain amount of authority to the State of New York, but we have failed. A bill on the subject was introduced in the House a few weeks ago which was reported with practical unanimity. One member dissented; but all of the majority, 15 or so, asserted the authority of the Federal Government over this stream.

In this connection I wish to read briefly from the treaty. No one can read carefully this treaty with reference to the Niagara River without deriving from it the inference that it was intended that the United States, the Federal Government, should have control.

Article 2, on page 4, says:

> Each of the high contracting parties reserves to itself or to the several State governments on the one side and the Dominion or provincial governments on the other as the case may be, subject to any treaty provisions now existing with respect thereto, the exclusive jurisdiction and control over the use and diversion, whether temporary or permanent, of all waters on its own side of the line which in their natural channels would flow across the boundary or into boundary waters.

Thus there is one section which provides that the respective Governments or the several State governments may control waters flowing across the boundary or flowing into the boundary waters. That is one provision.

In article 3 there is a provision in which it is agreed that there shall be no further or other uses of boundary waters except by authority of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada, omitting the reference to the States, and showing that as to boundary waters it was expected that the control would be exercised by the respective Federal Governments—that is, the Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Government of the United States. That was the general provision. But the article pertaining to the Niagara River is even more specific:

> So long as this treaty shall remain in force no diversion of the waters of the Niagara River above the Falls from the natural course and stream thereof shall be permitted except for the purposes and to the extent hereinafter provided.
>
> The United States may authorize and permit the diversion within the State of New York of the waters of said river above the Falls of Niagara for power purposes not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet of water per second.
> The United Kingdom, by the Dominion of Canada or the Province of Ontario, may authorize and permit the diversion within the Province of Ontario of the waters of said river above the Falls of Niagara for power purposes not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 36,000 cubic feet of water per second.

This shows in the most distinct language that the jurisdiction to permit the diversion of power was to rest with the United States so far as waters on our side were concerned; but that a different rule prevailed on the other side, as shown by the fact that the expression is in the alternative:

> The United Kingdom, by the Dominion of Canada, or the Province of Ontario.

Indeed, Mr. President, if this act should terminate, I do not see but that the power users would be in a very uncertain state, in that they would be withdrawing power without any authority whatever. The act of 1906 in its first section in the clearest language asserts the jurisdiction of the United States. It states:

> That the diversion of water from Niagara River or its tributaries, in the State of New York, is hereby prohibited, except with the consent of the Secretary of War as hereinafter authorized in section 2 of this act.

It then goes on to state the amount that may be diverted, the kind of regulations, and so forth.

In section 5 it is stated:

> That the provisions of this act shall remain in force for three years from and after date of its passage—

It has been extended so that its operation has continued until to-day—> at the expiration of which time all permits granted hereunder by the Secretary of War shall terminate unless sooner revoked, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to revoke any or all permits granted by him by authority of this act, and nothing herein contained shall be held to confirm, establish, or confer any rights heretofore claimed or exercised in the diversion of water or the transmission of power.

It is perfectly plain what the object of the act was—to assert and to establish the jurisdiction of the United States in the Niagara River. Permits were to be granted during the life of this law. When the law expired, the permits, or the rights granted by the permits, ceased, and it is expressly stated that nothing in them is to be held to confirm, establish, or confer any rights heretofore claimed or exercised in the diversion of water or the transmission of power.

Mr. President, I do not want to go into the subject of conservation here. This situation does not involve the general subject of diversion from navigable waters merely. This is a boundary stream, and as such the United States has complete control over it. In providing for the general defense Congress might pass a law or make regulations with a view to making the flow of water abundant or rapid in one stream so as to prevent invasion from across the border, and scanty in another, so as to make invasion of the other side easy. It is a navigable stream also. Strangely, it is navigable from Lake Erie almost to the Falls. Appropriations have been made by Congress to promote the navigability of this stream down to the very point where the intakes are situated, and improvements have been made down to that point. For both these reasons we have jurisdiction over it.

But, Mr. President, it may be conceded that the chief interest of Congress has been to prevent the ruin of the Falls. I know there are some who say that water power is becoming so valuable that the time is coming when the whole cataract must run dry. One of our prominent comic newspapers had a cartoon representing the situation as it would be with no water flowing over the crest of the Falls, with its beauty and grandeur departed, and with power houses on every hand. I do not think it was very humorous after all, for it was an intimation of what might happen.

"Oh," they say, "you can take any amount of water without diminishing the grandeur of the cataract or its beauty."

Mr. President, it is too obvious a proposition that when you have taken away nearly a fourth of the whole volume of water flowing over the Falls you can not take more without diminishing the scenic beauty. It is not merely a matter of the height on the crest, but of the volume. Both alike are required for the grandeur and beauty of the spectacle.

In the original act the amount of electrical power that could be brought over from Canada was limited to 160,000 horsepower. I do not like to see this amount increased, but in view of the insistent arguments that were made it seemed best to consent that that amount be increased to 250,000 horsepower, which is probably all that will be available for transmission from Canada into the United States under the amount of water which may be diverted by the terms of the treaty.

Mr. President, the petitions that were presented to Congress in the year 1906 praying for some action by Congress for the preservation of these Falls surpassed in number of signers and representative quality any petitions that I have ever known to be presented here. We have a responsibility to the country. We have a responsibility to save that cataract in all its beauty and grandeur. We have a responsibility to keep away the promoter, who would destroy its beauty, oftentimes coming here and saying, "Oh, we are interested in the Falls," but who are yet desirous of withdrawing so great an amount of water as practically to ruin their beauty and their grandeur as well.

But it is said, "The State of New York can take care of the situation." Why, Mr. President, the State of New York has no sufficient legislation on this subject, and I say, without intending to censure, that the State of New York allowed a condition to arise there in which it was necessary for Congress, by universal acquiescence, to act. Since the Niagara is a boundary stream and a navigable stream, it is not possible that the State of New York should have that degree of jurisdiction over it which will make adequate control possible. It is for us; it is our responsibility. I say again that I am willing to join with the Senator from New York or with anyone else whenever they will bring in here legislation that will sufficiently safeguard the cataract. But I object to turning this subject over to a State, because, in the first place, that State has provided no adequate legislation nor any proper machinery of government for its control; and, in the second place, because jurisdiction necessarily, under the treaty and under established law, must belong to the United States.

We sometimes look into the future, Mr. President. I do not believe there is any question to which a greater degree of attention will be given than to this subject when the new administration comes into power. I tender that administration my best wishes. If the principles which it advocates are best for the country, we shall acquiesce. The course of the new administration with reference to the preservation of Niagara Falls will be watched, not simply by one person, not simply by thousands, but by the whole of the American people, from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

We can not afford to let this act expire. We can not afford to throw the doors open for these men who have been crowding around this Capitol. One great reason why it has not been possible to frame satisfactory legislation on this subject has been that the different persons who were grasping for water power have been quarreling among themselves. If the act falls, they can go ahead one by one and divert water. It is no answer to say that the State of New York can or will prevent it.

Why, the State of New York has granted franchises in which there is no limit on the amount of water that may be diverted. There are now three or four companies at the falls whose use of water is strictly limited under regulations we have made, one of them having the right to withdraw 8,600 cubic feet per second, one 6,500, and another 500—in all, 15,600. How are you going to determine which one of those shall use any additional withdrawal which might be allowed? There they are, all three, ready to draw from the river an additional amount.

It is no answer to say that the total withdrawal is limited to 20,000 cubic feet per second. You have no regulations to control such withdrawal. You have framed no statutes on the subject. You have no sufficient power to do it. It belongs to the United States Government, under this treaty, to do it.

Again, if this act should fall, even if restricted by the treaty to the 20,000 cubic feet, the remaining 4,400 cubic feet allowed by the treaty would be immediately drawn out. That is the very thing that the engineers of the United States Army, those who have been most familiar with the conditions already existing, have said would be a calamity, because of the depletion which has already occurred.

Mr. President, with all the earnestness I can command, I insist that this resolution be passed this morning. I think otherwise we should fail in our duty to the people of this country, who love not merely the promotion of industries but beauty of scenery and that which inspires and uplifts. It is not meet that our whole civilization should be melted down into dollars. What would be the choice of the people of the United States between a few thousand more horsepower on the one side and the beauty and glory of Niagara Falls on the other? Shall we leave this question to those who wish the power, or shall we regard the wishes of those who desire the preservation of this, one of the most magnificent spectacles in the world, visited by millions, the object which many who have crossed the sea desired to visit more than any other? Shall we leave that out of account altogether?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, this resolution comes late. If it be of such urgent importance, it ought to have come sooner.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me for a moment?

Mr. OWEN. I will.

Mr. BURTON. I recognize that there has been some ground for complaint in that regard. A bill was introduced in the House some considerable time ago, and it was believed that it would pass. It was reported—I do not know the exact date—at a time sufficiently long before the expiration of the session to give promise that it would pass. But it was found that it could not obtain consideration, so this resolution was introduced in the House, because something must be done. It was passed promptly by the House and is now reported to the Senate by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand from the Senator from Ohio that the legislation already in existence expires in its operations to-morrow?

Mr. BURTON. It expires to-day.

Mr. NEWLANDS. To-day?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Have rights been built up under that legislation?

Mr. BURTON. Water has been withdrawn only under permits which specify the quantity which may be diverted. This law specifies the time during which they shall continue.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Are not all those permits revocable by the Secretary of War?

Mr. BURTON. They are all revocable by the Secretary of War. The law contains a provision in respect to that which I have already read.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Has any fee been exacted from either of the two companies that have a monopoly of the water power at Niagara Falls at the present time by virtue of permits from the Secretary of War?

Mr. BURTON. No; there has not, because they had charters from the State of New York, which were granted to them before the Federal Government exercised any authority, which were absolutely without limit or reservation. There was no reservation as to quantity. Under the laws of New York these companies might have taken out all of the waters of Niagara. There is one minor company. There are two large ones. I will read the names of these companies from the official record: The Niagara Falls Power Co., which has the right to divert 8,600 cubic feet, and the Niagara Falls Hydraulic Power & Manufacturing Co., which has the right to divert 6,500 feet. Then there is a minor company which enjoyed rights before this change was made, the Lockport Hydraulic Co., which has the right to divert 500 feet.

I will state—for I think that point should be made clear—that it was the purpose of this act to recognize existing rights there, or what were thought to be rights, under grants from the State of New York; to stop further diversion, but to allow existing users to withdraw just the same quantity of water which they had been withdrawing in the past.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Was it the main purpose of the National Government in the matter to preserve the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; not only in this act but in the treaty which was made with Great Britain.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the operation of this act is extended for one year, it will give us an opportunity to inquire into the law and all the facts and to legislate intelligently upon the subject?

Mr. BURTON. It will; certainly. As I said a little while ago, if it had not been for the contest between parties who were seeking privileges in that water and their failure to agree, we would have passed a statute long ago.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to proceed now without further interruption.

Mr. PAYNTER. I should like to be permitted to ask a question for information.

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. PAYNTER. Would the right of these power companies to get water cease when this act ceases to operate?

Mr. BURTON. I am of the opinion that it would. First, the Federal Government asserted its jurisdiction in unequivocal terms by the act of 1906. Second, in that act it was provided, incidentally, that the permits should be granted by the Secretary of War and might be canceled by him, and that the permits should cease on the termination of the act. Third, the treaty with Great Britain in explicit terms defines the quantity of water that may be diverted—20,000 cubic feet per second—and states that the United States may authorize and permit diversion, and so forth. To show that this meant the Federal Government, I have already called attention to the fact that the treaty in other places recognizes the right of the States under certain conditions to control the flow of water, and that in the very next paragraph authority is given either to the Dominion of Canada or to the Province of Ontario.

Mr. PAYNTER. For what purpose is the power used?

Mr. BURTON. For electrochemical processes, and it is transmitted to Buffalo and other points for general power purposes.

Mr. PAYNTER. For street car purposes?

Mr. BURTON. To an extent for that. The larger use, I think, is for chemical processes. The production of aluminum is one such use.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. And carbides.

Mr. PAYNTER. What is the right in the company to utilize the power?

Mr. BURTON. I think the companies diverting water would be, to say the least, in a very doubtful position if this resolution should fail.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (at 3 o'clock a. m., Tuesday, March 4). I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. OWEN. I have the floor, and I decline to yield for a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma declines to yield.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have been waiting for a convenient opportunity to submit some remarks to the RECORD. I have not been willing to delay any legislation which I thought of any great importance, and I have waited until this moment when a convenient opportunity might be afforded. Since I can hardly hope to entertain or to instruct Senators, and since it will take me some little time to say what I am going to say, I wish to give a gentle suggestion to Senators who may care for a little repose while I address the RECORD.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. OWEN. I will.

Mr. PENROSE. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Oklahoma and to the Senate, if it is agreeable. I ask unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock the Senate shall take a recess until 9.30 o'clock.

Mr. OWEN. That will be agreeable to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock the Senate stand in recess until 9.30. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I object.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will withdraw the objection.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the Senator's request?

Mr. PENROSE. I have just asked unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess from 4 o'clock until 9.30. I will supplement it with the request that no business be transacted except reports of conference committees.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Between now and 4?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would have no objection to that, provided no business will be done prior to 4 o'clock except the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. PENROSE. That is all right; it is merely the reception of the report.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the very report we want to consider.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that there has been some understanding among the conferees, but the exact nature of it I have not learned. I should like to have the report submitted if it is ready before the hour suggested.

Mr. SMOOT. I can say to the Senator if he is not satisfied with the report, then the bill will fail; there is no question about that. So the unanimous-consent agreement asked for will not affect that report.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is what I wanted to do. I want it to fail if it proposes to sacrifice the interests of the great mining regions which I represent and which many others represent here.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there are others here as much interested in that region as the Senator—I for one—and I am perfectly willing to accept the report when it comes in. If the Senator does not want to accept it, all he has to do is to object to it, and that will cause the bill to fail, without a question, at this session.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will take that responsibility very quickly.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Chair to put my request again for unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess at 4 o'clock until 9.30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania renews his request for unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the request?

Mr. ROOT. Could there be coupled with that a clause that no vote be taken between now and 4 o'clock?

Mr. LODGE. The conference report on the legislative appropriation bill, it is hoped, will be ready before 4 o'clock.

Mr. GAMBLE. I should think that action upon all conference reports on appropriation bills should be included in the understanding, and that an exception should not be made of any one bill.

Mr. OWEN. I will state that it is possible I shall occupy all the time until 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, so that it will be understood. It is that by unanimous consent the Senate stand in recess at 4 o'clock until 9.30. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In connection with that request for unanimous consent, I want to make a few innocuous observations. I think the time has about arrived when the Senate ought to serve notice upon any one or two Members of it that if they happen to differ with the balance of the Senate they can hold the Senate up, but they can not force it to quit; they can not intimidate it; and they can not make the Senate leave off the ordinary business.

Now, I do not know whether it is right or wrong to abolish the assay offices and mints that have been abolished in the legislative appropriation bill. I do not care whether it is right or wrong. I am rather inclined to vote, when the proposition comes up on its merits before the Senate, with the Senator from Nevada. But that is a different thing from holding a knife at my throat, and at the throat of the Senate, and giving notice that unless you agree to do what I want to do you may take a recess until 9 or 10 o'clock, or some other time, but the Senate shall not transact any business.

There are important matters of public business pending before this body, and I see no reason why 94 men should be any weaker in endurance physically or mentally than any one or two. My idea is that we should stay in session and let gentlemen talk or do whatever else they are going to do. They can not do much harm. The extra session will soon come, and these matters will have to come up again, and we will then have such a length of time before us that gentlemen can not talk things to death.

I want to maintain the right of unlimited speech in the Senate. I want to do it for minority and sectional reasons. I have been in a minority nearly all my life, and I do not expect to remain in a majority all the balance of my life. But I do think it is about time we were reading a riot act upon the question of holding up the Senate and the public business upon small and immaterial matters. When a great principle of human liberty is at stake, when a great principle of natural right is at stake, when a great principle of sectional preservation is at stake, I would stand here and metaphorically, if not literally, die in the ditch. But I do not think that this right which is so precious to the Republic ought to be abused about little bits of things, and I think the only way to keep it from being abused is to let gentlemen understand that when they serve notice upon an overwhelming majority of the Senate the overwhelming majority of the Senate will make rejoinder.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, there is no necessity for any heat on the part of the Senator from Mississippi. I have served no notice upon the Senate. I simply insist that new legislation affecting a very material industry in the West, the great mining industry, is just as important to that region as the agricultural industry is to the Senator from Mississippi, and when that new legislation comes up in an appropriation bill it should be discussed just as thoroughly as if it came up by an original bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me for one question, perhaps I misunderstood him, but I understood him to say in response to a question by the Senator from Utah that that was just what he wanted; that he wanted the bill to fail unless he could accomplish the purposes of his amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I said that very candidly. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was the notice to which I referred as having been served upon the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I simply want to state, as the colleague of the senior Senator from Nevada, that I am in thorough accord with the position that he has taken in this matter. I wish to state to the Senator from Mississippi that I took pleasure the other night in hearing him state that if the river and harbor bill was not passed there would be no other appropriation bills passed at this session of Congress. I have always looked to him for advice. We are still looking to him for advice with regard to matters that affect his section of the country. We are looking to him for advice with regard to the parliamentary rules of this body—at least I am. I have the highest respect for him.

I did not intend to say a word with regard to this matter, because I believe that my colleague has more ably presented it than I am able to present it. But I would not be willing to stand here and have him take the burden of this matter without saying anything. I want to state now that I do not believe that the other House of Congress understood the necessity of this matter, because this body which has heard it argued has voted for it by a large majority. I think that we have the right to speak sufficiently long on this matter to satisfy ourselves that the question is understood, and whether it be a subject of particular interest to any particular locality, I want to state most emphatically that I am going to discuss this question until I have satisfied myself that it is thoroughly understood by every Senator who desires to vote upon it. I will not be limited in that matter either by the wishes of any other Senator or by the hours that that argument may cease.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Nevada will pardon one more interruption, I am informed——

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Oklahoma will yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I beg pardon; I thought the Senator from Nevada had the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It was by the courtesy of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Oklahoma will pardon an interruption, I understand that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] referred to me as having said that unless the rivers and harbors bill be passed no other appropriation bill should pass. What I said was that unless I could get a vote in the Senate upon the rivers and harbors bill I would never consent to its displacement, no matter what else came; and I say the same thing about this and all the routine supply bills and ordinary appropriation bills. I say the Senate ought to say that unless there can be gotten a vote it will not be intimidated by the fear of losing any other bills.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator from Oklahoma will pardon me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say that this is not the individual matter of the State of Nevada; that some 15 States are interested largely in the mining industry; and that the Representatives of those States are of one mind regarding this legislation; and the Senate was apparently of the same mind, for it sustained us in a recent discussion.

This is a matter that the Appropriations Committee of the House has taken in hand. It has dealt with the question purely as one of economy. As I stated before, it has not considered the question at all from the standpoint of economics as it affects the great industries of the West. We of the West insist that this action is just as prejudicial to our interest as would be the action of the Appropriations Committee of the House if, without consulting the committee having jurisdiction, it should on an appropriation bill take away the appropriations for all the agricultural experiment stations in the farming States.

Thus far the subject has not had the consideration of the proper committee of the House. I had a conversation only a few moments ago with the Representative who is chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, which has jurisdiction of this subject, and he was surprised to find that it had any other side than that relating to economy, and when I presented the other considerations he said he would look up the conferees of the House and suggest to them that they should yield, and that the matter should go to the proper committees for consideration during the next session. It would then be taken up in an orderly way by the proper committee of the House and the proper committee of the Senate, and we would abide by the judgment of the Senate and House guided by its committees.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to renew my request——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object to the request made by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Oklahoma kindly yield to me? I will take but a moment.

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to say very briefly that I heartily agree with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Mississippi. This body is one of the greatest deliberative bodies in the world. Everybody admits that. There is absolute freedom of speech and no limit upon it. There was a time when the privilege of indefinite debate was not abused. I have been here six or seven years, and on several occasions when we get, as we are now, within less than nine hours of the time when, under the Constitution of our country, we have to adjourn, certain gentlemen always appear who see a great issue in some local or State issue which leads them to say that it is their intention to inform the Senate at such length upon the matter in question as that it necessarily defeats great national measures of general interest.

I agree with the Senator from Mississippi that the country is getting sick of an abuse of what was designed to be a bulwark and a protection against oppression, and I simply prophesy that if it continues to occur on matters that are not of vital national interest there is certain be a rule introduced here and adopted by which, when a certain great preponderance of Senators—say nine-tenths of this body—are sufficiently informed and want to come to a vote upon any measure pending before the Senate, there shall be some form of cloture in this body.

I for one, although I have hitherto stood for absolute freedom of debate, am getting very near the point where I am ready to vote for some form of cloture unless these perfectly obvious abuses shall cease.

Mr. OWEN. I assume that unanimous consent is impossible, but I should be glad, as far as I am concerned, if I might have unanimous consent simply to put in the RECORD the remarks I propose to make; but it is contrary to the rules of the Senate, and I suppose there would be objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am perfectly willing to give unanimous consent to the Senator to put his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. OWEN. I would be very glad to have permission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would object to that, not because I have any personal feeling as to the remarks of the Senator, but it is against the traditions of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Not only did I not wish to detain the Senate, but there was the further reason that I did not want to lacerate the feelings of the Senator from Mississippi, because I am going to speak upon the initiative and referendum.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know whether the Senate realizes that a great deal of work must be done in this Chamber before the apartment can be fitted for the ceremonies to-day. All these chairs must be taken out and others put in their places, the room must be cleaned, and some time must be allowed to employees of the Senate for that work.

I move that the Senate take a recess at half past 4 until half past 9 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why make it half past 4? Let us take it now.

Mr. SMOOT and others. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It may be true that in consequence of this threat we might meet here to-morrow, with no place provided for the ambassadors and not much place for the incoming President, but the country will understand who brought about that state of affairs. That we should consent to be intimidated into taking a position because we will not be quite cleaned up by the time we make a new inauguration it seems to me adds no strength to the argument for it. It seems to me to add strength to the argument against it. Now, if any two or three gentlemen want to take the responsibility, just simply because the salaries of a few employees are involved, of holding up not only the Senate but the inauguration ceremonies of the first Democratic President who has been elected for 16 years, let them take it.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no inclination to hold it up, I will say to the Senator. If the Senator from Oklahoma will begin with the speech which he says he desires to make——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not objecting to the speech of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. SMOOT. We can stay here, and the conferees on the legislative bill may be ready to report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why could we not agree by unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Oklahoma we will take a recess until half past 9 to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Oklahoma we take a vote upon the conference report.

Mr. PENROSE. Would you have a quorum?

Mr. SMOOT. There would not be a quorum.

Mr. PENROSE. If there would be no quorum on the vote we could not then take a recess.

Mr. SMOOT. We could not take a recess then.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I want to ask a question of the Senator from Mississippi, and I hope that the Senators from Nevada will hear the question that I ask the Senator from Mississippi. The other day when the debate developed on this question of the assay offices and the mints out in the West and the Northwest I asked if they were of real convenience to the people and if there was a necessity for them. In perfect good faith I put the question, and the reply was in the affirmative.

If I understood the Senator from Mississippi a moment ago he puts it upon the basis that in order to retain a few officials in office these gentlemen are making this fight. If that be true, I quit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is about true; from what I understand the conferees agree to keep them until the end of the next fiscal year and it involves only the loss of a few offices.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say that in making that statement the Senator from Mississippi shows such ignorance regarding the fact that I shall insist on taking sufficient time to give him some information.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may possibly be true. I was informed by a Senator a few moments ago, in whose judgment and knowledge I have a great deal of confidence, that they had agreed to continue these assay offices and mints in existence until the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The end of the next fiscal year?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; that was my understanding.

Mr. NEWLANDS. When we receive an assurance of that kind we will acquiesce.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that my request be put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma the Senate take a recess until 9.30 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the greatest duty of government is to make effective the primary principle of the Declaration of Independence; to secure to the people, and to all the people, the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

This inalienable right with which the people were "endowed by the Creator" has been purloined from millions to the benefit of the few through a series of political, commercial, and financial monopolies slowly built up during the last 75 years.

This system has diverted the proceeds of the labor of millions to the coffers of the few, until in spite of the wonderful modern inventions of this age, which pours out a stupendous flood of material things which men desire, we see a thousand millions of dollars of wealth in the hands of a single man and millions of human beings, willing and anxious to do honest labor, without the certainty of food and shelter to-morrow.

The unrestricted right to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness is thus denied millions, and the duty of the Government to make effective the fundamental doctrine of the Republic as yet remains unperformed.

I deem it my duty to call the attention of the United States Senate and the attention of the country to the cause and the remedy of this serious condition. I make no complaint of a class, emphatically no complaint of a rich class, nor do I complain of the past. I am exclusively concerned with the immediate future welfare of men, women, and children.

THE CAUSE.

The cause is this: The people's-rule party Government under Jefferson has been in past years (from 1844 to 1908) steadily, if not stealthily undermined and replaced by the machine-rule party government. In place of the people's rule the machine rule, financed and engineered by special interests, has placed in power on a vast scale in legislative, administrative, and judicial positions machine-rule representatives—in municipalities, States, and Nation. The rule of the few was thus established. The people have voted, but they have not really ruled.

The rule of the few, consciously or unconsciously, has been too largely for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many.

The few have established all-pervading commercial and financial monopolies; destroyed all competitive markets in selling and buying; limited production on a giant scale, and deliberately as a policy, thus limiting the employment of labor; manufactured watered stocks and bonds by billions of value, on which the people have been compelled to pay interest; squeezed and expanded the credit market, damaging millions, that a few might absorb values; and have compelled the laboring millions to compete under harsh conditions with each other, until millions of women and children have been driven from the American home into the labor market, and millions of children as well as women and men have been denied the reasonable opportunities of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Machine-made representatives in legislative, executive, and judicial position have granted and protected privilege to the few at the expense of the many until we are face to face with the most tremendous extremes of wealth and poverty the world has ever known.

The cause has been machine-rule party government in collusion with corrupt commercial and financial allies governing for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many, at the expense of all of the people, at the expense of the real producers of wealth.

There are two very different kinds of "representatives" in the governing business. The machine-rule party government representatives who take the point of view favorable to privilege and to the few, and the people's-rule party government representatives who take the point of view favorable to equal rights to all, favorable to the great mass of men who labor as artisans, workers in shop, field, forest, and mine, as professional men or in transportation or in other human activities.

I do not trouble myself to question the motives of men; I am concerned with the effect of the actions of men.

THE REMEDY.

The remedy is to restore people's-rule party government and provide a mechanism by which the intelligence and patriotism of the mass of men can control party government and can control the actual direct government by people's-rule representatives in the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the government.

The statutes necessary to this end are—

First. A thoroughgoing honest registration act.

Second. A thoroughgoing direct mandatory primary act.

Third. Honest election laws and machinery.

Fourth. A thoroughgoing corrupt-practices prevention act.

Fifth. The initiative, referendum, and recall; and the most important of all these acts is the initiative and referendum, which is the open door to all other reforms.

Above all the initiative and referendum offers the line of least resistance in obtaining reform for the reason that no candidate before the people dares refuse the people the right of the initiative and referendum where the demand is vigorously insisted on.

In its entire history the Senate has never had a more important question before it. It is the duty of the Senate to throw the weight of its influence on the right side.

And I feel entirely justified in calling the attention of the Senate and of the country to the urgent, vital importance of this issue and to defend it against the unjust assaults of its enemies.

Whatever I may say in regard to the matter must be regarded as entirely impersonal, as I fully concede the right of others to differ with me and shall carefully abstain from attributing to other Senators any unpatriotic motive in promoting their political philosophy, however mischievous and disastrous I may think the effects of such doctrines would be if they should be adopted.

Mr. President, on January 2, 1912, a then Senator from Texas [Mr. Bailey] delivered an address of three hours in the Senate in an attempt to show that "such a system of direct legislation" as "the initiative and referendum" would establish would be in conflict with "the representative principle" on which he alleged "this Republic was founded."

This speech, on February 4, 1913 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2530), was offered to be printed as a Senate document.

In order to make this deliberate assault on the principles of popular government the then Senator raised a moot question by submitting and speaking to the following resolution:

Senate resolution 413.

Resolved, That such a system of direct legislation as the initiative and referendum would establish is in conflict with the representative principle on which this Republic was founded and would, if adopted, inevitably work a radical change in the character and structure of our Government.

No action was requested on this resolution. It is obvious that this speech, offered to be printed as a Senate document, was intended to be used as a campaign document by those who oppose popular government and the initiative and referendum, which is the open door to real popular government. This opposition to popular government has recently prepared numerous speeches which have been printed as Senate documents for the campaign against the people's rule, some of which I shall mention. For example:

1. An address delivered by Mr. LODGE (Senator from Massachusetts) at Raleigh, N. C., November 28, 1911, on "The Constitution and its makers," and presented to the United States Senate by a Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], with the request that it be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 122.)

2. An address delivered by Hon. ELIHU ROOT at the annual meeting of the New York Bar Association in New York City on January 19, 1912, entitled "Judicial decisions and public feeling," presented by a Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], with the request that it be printed as a Senate document, January 2, 1912. (S. Doc. No. 271.)

3. An address delivered by Mr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of the Columbia University, late Republican vice presidential candidate before electoral college, before the Commercial Club of St. Louis, November 27, 1911, entitled "Why should we change our form of government," presented by a Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on January 3, 1912, with the request that it be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 238.)

4. An address delivered by Hon. SAMUEL W. MCCALL, a Member of Congress from Massachusetts, before the Ohio State Bar Association, on July 12, 1911, entitled "Representative as against direct government," presented by a Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the United States Senate, with the request that it be printed as a Senate document, January 23, 1912. (S. Doc. No.

5. An address delivered by Hon. Emmett O'Neal, governor of Alabama, at the one hundred and forty-third annual banquet of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York at the Waldorf, November 16, 1911, entitled "Representative government and the common law—A study of the initiative and referendum," presented to the Senate by a Senator from Texas [Mr. Bailey], with the request that it be printed as a Senate document, January 3, 1912. (S. Doc. No. 240.)

6. An address by President Taft to the general court of the Legislature of Massachusetts, at Boston, Mass., March 18, 1912, against giving the people direct power, presented to the United States Senate by a Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with a request that it be printed as a Senate document, March 22, 1912. (S. Doc. No. 451.)

7. An address by Mr. Wendell Phillips Stafford (an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia), before the New York County Lawyers' Association, February 17, 1912, entitled "The new despotism," referring to the despotism of a majority of the citizens in the several States and in the United States over the minority, presented by a Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the United States Senate, with the request that it be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 344.)

8. An address delivered in the United States Senate by a Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], July 11, 1911, entitled "Government by ballot," denouncing the initiative, referendum, and recall (the principles of the constitution of Utah). (Senate document room.)

9. An address by Hon. William H. Taft (President of the United States) at Toledo, Ohio, on March 8, 1912, entitled "The judiciary and progress," opposing the recall and the extension of popular government, presented to the United States Senate by a Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], with the request that it be printed as a Senate document, March 13, 1912. (S. Doc. No. 408.)

10. An address by Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE (a United States Senator from Massachusetts), delivered at Princeton University, March 8, 1912, entitled "The compulsory initiative and referendum and the recall of judges," presented to the United States Senate by a Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], with the request that it be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 406.)

11. An address by a Senator from Texas [Mr. Bailey] opposing the initiative and referendum and the recall, delivered January 2, 1913.

The glaring error of these various arguments against the principles of popular government I caused to be answered by one of the clearest thinkers and most patriotic men in the United States, C. F. Taylor, Esq., editor of Equity, Philadelphia. (S. Doc. No. 651, May 8, 1912.)

But these speeches against the principles of popular government are not the only ones printed as Senate documents and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sixty-second Congress, first session, volume 47, page 3738, contains an argument against the initiative, referendum, and recall, by Clinton W. Howard, introduced into the RECORD by a Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, a Senator from Massachusetts, delivered a speech before the Central Labor Union of Boston, opposing the right of the people of Massachusetts to express their opinion on any public policy, which was such a valuable contribution to political literature that it was printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 114, Sixtieth Congress, first session.)

Hon. James A. Tawney delivered a speech before the Minnesota Bankers' Association, June 21, 1911, opposing the initiative, referendum, and recall, which was so highly approved by Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, formerly Speaker of the House of Representatives, that he had it put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the first session of this Congress. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 47, p. 4231.)

And the Hon. George W. Wickersham, Attorney General of the United States, delivered a speech at Syracuse, N. Y., repeated it at Cleveland, and repeated it again at Princeton, N. J., and which was also printed in this Congress as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 20.)

Hon. George W. Wickersham, Attorney General of the United States, delivered another argument against the initiative, referendum, and recall before the law school of Yale, which was printed in this Congress as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 62.)

They are, with only two exceptions, the arguments of leading standpat Republicans of the most reactionary type. It is the point of view of the federalist as opposed to the democratic point of view. (See Federalist Letter No. 10.)

I need not mention other speeches in opposition. These are sufficient to show who opposes, and to make it easy to ascertain what their point of view is. However worded, the argument of all these gentlemen proceeds from a common basis—a distrust of the people, a lack of confidence in the capacity of the people for self-government.

The then Senator from Texas complained in the beginning of his remarks of the "unparalleled zeal" of those who favor the initiative and referendum, and suggested that "the men who are opposed to the initiative and referendum have made no special effort to combat them." The various speeches above referred to against popular government shows an extensive propaganda against popular government being carried on by the leaders of the Republican Party of the extreme type.

President Taft six years ago traveled 1,600 miles to make a set speech against the initiative and referendum at Oklahoma City, advising the people of Oklahoma against this "cumbersome and illogical legislative method" contained in their proposed constitution, pointing out the dangers that would ensue from such "hasty, irrational, and immoderate" legislation, and so forth.

The people of Oklahoma having considered well the views of Mr. Taft voted in favor of the initiative and referendum by 107,000 majority, substantially only the Republican officeholders and the voters they could influence being against it.

It is an interesting matter to observe that the then Senator from Texas, in his crusade against the initiative and referendum, is found in close working sympathy with the Republican statesmen above referred to, the followers of Alexander Hamilton and his theory of the wisdom of the rule of the few and of the folly of the rule of the common people (Senator LODGE, Senator ROOT, Senator SUTHERLAND, President Taft, James A. Tawney, JOSEPH G. CANNON, Representative MCCALL, Nicholas Murray Butler, W. P. Stafford, C. W. Howard, Attorney General Wickersham, Senator OLIVER, Senator GALLINGER, Senator JONES, Senator SMITH of Michigan). The then Senator explained that he had been called a "reactionary." It is his arguments, his public utterances, and his company in the assault on the initiative and referendum and on popular government that have doubtless contributed to fix this public estimate of the Senator.

THE WEIGHT OF POPULAR OPINION FAVORS THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM WHEREVER IT HAS BEEN DISCUSSED.

I call attention to the fact that the State lately represented by the then Senator—Texas—has just returned his successor—Mr. MORRIS SHEPPARD—who was overwhelmingly elected by the people of Texas over the opposition of the recent Senator after Mr. SHEPPARD had made a campaign defending popular government and the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. So that the people of Texas have thus approved the principles of the initiative and referendum, advocated by their present Senator, and have not been persuaded to the contrary by the eloquence of his predecessor.

Not only have the people of Texas thus approved the advocate of the initiative and referendum [Mr. SHEPPARD], but the great adjacent Commonwealths of Oklahoma, Arkansas, and Missouri have placed the initiative and referendum in their constitutions. The vote in Mississippi in 1912 was two to one in favor of the initiative and referendum, but failed of adoption because of the antiquated provision requiring a majority of all votes cast in the election; and the advisory vote in Illinois was over three to one, but a machine jack-pot legislature trampled upon the direct mandate of the people. The States of Washington, Oregon, California, Arizona, Nevada, Utah, Montana, South Dakota, Colorado, Nebraska, and even the far eastern State of Maine, Arkansas, Missouri, and Idaho and the central State of Ohio, have adopted the initiative and referendum in their constitutions, and many other States are on the point of adopting the initiative and referendum, so that we may speedily expect the adoption in at least 14 additional States of the initiative and referendum which President Taft denounced six years ago when Oklahoma was beginning this great fight for restoring popular government. When I entered the Senate only Oregon had the initiative and referendum in good working order, two other States—Montana and South Dakota—then having adopted it in a weak form. It has become a nation-wide issue among the States, and we find ourselves even in the United States Senate face to face with numerous Senate documents containing many addresses delivered against the principles of direct popular government by various Republican leaders—Senator LODGE, at Raleigh; Senator ROOT; Nicholas Murray Butler; Congressman MCCALL; Senator SUTHERLAND; President Taft before the Massachusetts Legislature; President Taft at Toledo; Justice Stafford, of the District of Columbia, in New York City; Attorney General Wickersham; James A. Tawney; Senator LODGE at Princeton.

This great progressive movement for perfecting popular government has seized upon the heart of the national Democracy which has chosen as the next President a man who thoroughly understands this issue and has thrown himself with enthusiasm into the leadership of it.

Ninety per cent of the Democratic Party membership is thoroughly progressive. Ten per cent of the members, perhaps, may not clearly understand the issue, or some may be still blinded or misled by private interests, and some may be influenced unconsciously by their attachment to the old game of machine politics, which is now staggering to its final fall on American soil. Shallow epithet or thoughtless denunciation will no longer serve to meet the grave issues presented in this country for the complete reestablishment of popular self-government.

WHY THE PEOPLE NEED THE INITIATIVE AND THE REFERENDUM.

The people need the initiative to pass the laws they do want and need and which the legislature (especially a machine-controlled legislature) for any reason fails to pass, and they need the referendum so as to have the power of veto over crooked and corrupt or undesired laws which might be passed by the legislature (especially a machine-controlled legislature).

Why is it that they do not get the laws they want, and why is it that they get the laws they do not want?

MACHINE POLITICS OR BOSS RULE.

The answer to this is known to every student of our public law. It is due to the evil results of machine politics, which, in its worst form, begins with a crooked precinct organization, controls nominations and ballot boxes and election machinery, and has contrived to bring about a gross and corrupt miscarriage of our "representative democracy," wherein nominations are fraudulently extracted from prearranged conventions, wherein State officers are nominated by State conventions composed of machine politicians thrice refined through the State convention, the county convention, and the precinct convention or caucus. Machine party rule is organization, once honorable and legitimate, which has fallen into the hands of machine men, where the principle of good government is not the controlling force but where selfish private ambition or private gain controls.

Under this system, if a governor is to be nominated by one or the other of the two leading parties (the process has largely been the same in either party when the corrupt machine is once established), the following method is pursued: The State chairman calls for delegates to a State convention, assigning each county so many delegates. Thereupon the county chairman calls for a county convention, consisting of delegates, assigning to each precinct one or more delegates, whereupon, the precinct committeeman (who when the machine actually exists is a petty precinct boss, a cog in the machine) calls a precinct convention or caucus to select the delegate or delegates to the county convention. Such a precinct boss will call the precinct caucus on short notice, obscure advertisement, at an inconvenient time and place, possibly over a saloon, and will pack this little precinct caucus with his own henchmen and friends by extraordinary diligence. He will have prepared on a slip of paper the delegates he wants elected. He will call the meeting to order perhaps 10 minutes before the time set, his watch being a little fast, he will ask if there are any nominations, and one of his henchmen will nominate the boss himself, perhaps, or some equally trusted gentleman of the machine, and they will vote instantly. It will be carried by acclamation and the meeting will adjourn sine die, and then and there the governing power departs from the "dear people," never to return. The 300 votes in the precinct have then and there had their governing power purloined and stolen by the machine. The American eagle has fallen into the trap of the machine and is safely tied down. The county convention—when under machine management—consists of such high-minded patriots, self-selected, who will nominate the most select of their own class to represent the citizenship of that county in the State convention, and the State convention, consisting of these self-selected rulers by this highly refining process, will dispose of the nominations of all important State offices, governors, attorneys general, supreme court judges, legislators, and so forth and nominate "hand picked" delegates to nominate a presidential candidate in national convention.

In this State convention these self-selected rulers write the party platform which binds the State legislature and the State officials of all classes, from the governor down. The governing business has thus been transferred through the machine-organized precinct from the body of the good citizens, who are unorganized and unobservant, and who possibly may not suspect fraud, into the hands of a band of organized mercenaries.

A national convention based on fraud at the precinct is one degree worse than a State convention. These self-selected rulers who have thus by the crafty process of machine politics succeeded in framing State conventions, county conventions, district conventions, etc., and national conventions, and in nominating the officials of the State and Nation and in laying down the party platform, which means the rule of government, having nominated their chosen friends for various positions, proceed to elect them by processes even more criminal. To start with, they stuff the registration lists with dead men and ghosts. They put down the names of men who do not exist and have their henchmen arrange strikers to represent these artificial voters. In Oklahoma City recently there were large numbers of such false registrations reported. In New York City at one time they discovered over 30,000 of such false registrations. In Philadelphia, I am advised, there were disclosed over 70,000 at one time, and only the Lord of Truth knows how many they really have had in this Nation. These organized scamps get charge of the election machinery, they name the State election board, and the county election boards, the city and county precinct election officials; they have control of the ballot boxes and of the ballots; they bribe or coerce weak voters; sometimes they stuff the boxes; and sometimes, where public opinion will not stand for this, they content themselves by voting thousands of falsely registered names; they arrange that a machine tool may vote five times in a precinct under five different names, and then repeat his vote as many times under other names in each of 10 other precincts. Such a useful voter—called a repeater—deserves to be rewarded with public employment and usually is rewarded by being given some political preferment in a small way, sometimes merely by being paid so much money for his services and by an occasional job.

The machine may control the police, and at the ballot boxes they can see to it that no interference with their plans is permitted. They also control sometimes the judges of the courts, who will accord "a fair hearing" to any scamp that belongs to the machine and shield him from lawful punishment. There are found sufficient technical reasons why these scoundrels never get inside of the jails. It is not enough to stuff the ballot boxes in this way; these officers of election can also deface and count out the ballots of citizens who are "against the machine." They can, under their rules of management, throw out a precinct or a whole county where the better element prevails for fictitious reasons, deliberately devised by this system of organized rascality. So that, even where an honest majority might, in spite of all pitfalls, be found, the machine, through the process of thus fraudulently nominating and fraudulently electing candidates, can overthrow the majority and retain possession of the governing business. Patriotic men have discovered these evil elements to be in control of the governing powers of the States in greater or lesser degree, and that the machine and its agents and representatives have become the allies and the agents of organized greed and corrupt selfishness, until in some States and cities the whole system of government has become so despicable that the best citizens of the State, in despair, absent themselves from the polls and take little or no interest in public affairs, on the ground that politics is a "dirty business." Honest citizens justly complain of the corrupt alliance between the political party machine—often bipartisan, as in New York, Illinois, and Pennsylvania—and the corrupt corporations, which deliberately engaged in swindling the people out of vast property rights by granting privileges and properties that belong to the people without fair consideration. What is even worse, this evil system has not only given the people no relief against the organized monopoly that has slowly absorbed nearly all of the opportunities of life and are oppressing the people beyond reason in a mad race for wealth accumulation, but has tremendously contributed to the establishment of monopoly by legislative favor and by executive immunity. Congress itself has exemplified this system and until recently had not given relief which the people had a right to ask, although the political parties had been promising the people relief for years.

Those who have opposed enlarging the direct power of the people, led by President Taft, loudly proclaimed in the campaign of 1908, in answer to the Democratic demand for the "people's rule," that the people did rule through the Republican Party, and that those who claimed that the people were not ruling were merely agitators and demagogues.

The great progressive party of the country, the Democratic Party, raised this issue of direct legislation and declared in favor of it in the national platform of 1900. They demanded the direct election of Senators; they demanded the publicity of campaign contributions; they demanded an end to corrupt practices; and they demanded "the people's rule" in terms most emphatic in the platform of 1908, denouncing the graft and political corruption traced to the representatives of predatory wealth, the debauchery of elections, and declaring "the rule of the people" to be "the overwhelming issue."

The people realized in 1909, when the Republican Party leaders passed the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, that the Republican leaders did not represent the people but represented privilege and private interests. It was obvious from their conduct that the people did not really rule the country, but that organized plutocracy was in control. In an address to the Senate before the campaign of 1910 on the 28th day of May, 1910, I called the attention of the country to the fact that the people did not really rule in Congress; that the people had been promised many things for years by the party in power and had been continually disappointed. I pointed out then many things which the people justly desired and had prayed for in vain.

That they had urgently desired—

The control of monopoly.

Lower prices on the necessaries of life and on manufactured goods.

Lower railroad rates. Lower passenger rates.

Physical valuation of railroads and of telegraph and telephone and industrial corporations.

Reciprocity with other nations.

An act preventing corrupt practices in governmental processes.

A sweeping control of improper campaign contributions.

An end of gambling in agricultural products, cotton, and foodstuffs.

The abatement of the gigantic stock and bond gambling establishment in Wall Street.

An end to overcapitalization of stocks and bonds.

An end to unfair railway discriminations.

The development of good roads.

The legitimate development of national waterways.

An income tax.

A progressive inheritance tax.

An employers' liability act.

An act providing adequate workmen's compensation.

A minimum wage for women.

An eight-hour labor day.

Fair treatment for child labor.

Fair prices for their crude products.

The right both to buy and to sell on a competitive market.

All these things the people had sought and had not received because they did not really rule through the Republican Party.

RELIEF IS ABOUT TO COME THROUGH THE PROGRESSIVE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

The demand for the people's rule became the battle cry of the Democracy in 1908, and in 1910 the people captured the House of Representatives through the Democratic Party and immediately undertook the fulfillment of these promises for a better government by overthrowing Cannonism and by passing numerous acts reducing the tariff, all vetoed by Mr. Taft.

The Democratic Party made good in 1911 and 1912, and in the campaign of 1912 they took further advanced ground toward purifying the processes of government and establishing the rule of the people in the following magnificent declaration:

> We direct attention to the fact that the Democratic Party's demand for a return to the rule of the people, expressed in the national platform four years ago, has now become the accepted doctrine of a large majority of the electors. We again remind the country that only by a larger exercise of the reserved power of the people can they protect themselves from the misuse of delegated power and the usurpation of governmental instrumentality by special interests. For this reason the national convention insisted on the overthrow of Cannonism and the inauguration of a system by which United States Senators could be elected by direct vote. The Democratic Party offers itself to the country as an agency through which the complete overthrow and extirpation of corruption, fraud, and machine rule in American politics can be effected.

They went further; they provided for a preferential ballot for presidential candidates in 1916 by a primary and for election likewise of members of the Democratic national committee, who should immediately take their places and put an end to the machine management of the Democratic national committee in the following language:

> We direct that the national committee incorporate in the call for the next nominating convention a requirement that all expressions of preference for presidential candidates shall be given and the selection of delegates and alternates made through a primary election conducted by the party organization in each State where such expression and election are not provided for by State law. Committeemen who are hereafter to constitute the membership of the Democratic national committee and whose election is not provided for by law shall be chosen in each State at such primary elections, and the service and authority of the committeemen, however chosen, shall begin immediately upon the receipt of their credentials, respectively.

They did more. They pledged an end to abuse of money in elections by publicity and by limiting individual contributions in the following plank:

> We pledge the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law prohibiting any corporation from contributing to a campaign fund and any individual from contributing any amount above a reasonable maximum.

They went further to break up machine rule by proposing to put an end to the abuse of patronage by a President in renominating himself in the following plank:

> We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

They declared for the control by the people of the United States Senate by the direct election of Senators.

The Democratic Congress of 1910 and 1912 was a Congress of magnificent accomplishment, overthrowing Cannonism, passing acts to lower taxes, providing the direct election of Senators, admitting progressive Arizona and giving New Mexico an amendable constitution, limiting the election expenses of Senators and Representatives, passing a bill to prevent the abuse of injunction, passing a bill giving an eight-hour day for workmen, and so forth.

The Democratic Party in its platform of 1912 promised the people the relief which they have all these years hoped for—tariff reform, control of the trusts, lowering the cost of living, physical valuation of railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines, proper banking legislation, development of waterways and roads, declaring in favor of conserving the property of the people, the protection of the rights of labor, to establish a Department of Labor, to establish an independent public health service, to establish the parcel post (now the law), and to reform the administration of the civil and criminal law.

The tremendous effect of the sound, honest, wise Democratic point of view on next week—March 4, 1913—will be far removed from the point of view of the Aldrich régime of six years ago.

Mr. President, the people are going to rule through the progressive Democratic Party, which has pledged itself as an agency through which they can really enforce the matured public opinion of the country.

The progressive policies of the Democratic Party mean the absolute overthrow of the political machine, and I rejoice in the declaration of the noble platform that—

> The Democratic Party offers itself to the country as an agency through which the complete overthrow and extirpation of corruption, fraud, and machine rule in American politics can be effected.

And I remind my fellow Senators that the initiative and the referendum and the recall comprise the quickest, most direct, adequate available means by which to put an end to corrupt machine politics in the Nation and to overthrow the baleful influence of the machine.

The ideals of the machine are low. The notion of the machine politician is to get a job at governmental expense for himself and his cronies; perhaps to make money out of the governing business by selling privileges to those who wish to buy at the expense of the people—it may be the selling of municipal contracts; it may be selling franchises; it may be selling immunity from the law intended to control vice and criminal conduct; it may be the blackmailing of legitimate business through a jack-pot legislature, or the withholding, until paid for, the statutes required by the people. There are numerous degrees of the machine, from the comparatively harmless to that which is utterly corrupt and criminal.

There are many perfectly honest men, however, who stand by a party organization as a matter of party loyalty, not realizing when legitimate organization becomes illegitimate organization; when honest party organization becomes a dishonest organization unworthy the support of good men, when their party management falls into the hands of a selfish or corrupt machine.

This mischief-breeding system has grown from the convention system, as established in 1832, which developed into the dangerous machine-rule system in 1844, against which Benton and Calhoun made their great protests. They forecasted what has happened, and we are now trying to undo the harm which was then begun, and which in recent years has reached such an evil eminence. It is against the bad practices and evil results of machine government that thoughtful citizens have determined to promote the initiative and referendum. In 1902, by the vigorous questioning of candidates by nonpartisan organizations, a wedge was forced into the iron-clad panoply of the two great political parties, in both of which the machine existed in greater or less degree, and in this way an opening was made for the establishment of the greatest of all of the agencies for enforcing "representative democracy." We had the form of a representative democracy—we did not have its substance for the reason that in many cases the representatives in State legislatures and in Congress and in executive and judicial offices, owing their elections to the machine, and the political machine having a good working agreement with the corrupt commercial and financial interests, prevented the representatives of the people really representing the people and had them in fact representing the special interests as against the general interest.

The people need the initiative and referendum as the quickest means by which they can conveniently overthrow the corrupt political machines in the United States. By the initiative the people can pass any law they do want, and by the referendum they can veto any law they do not want, and this is a deadly peril to the machine and to the "representative" who is really a representative of corrupt special interests, while it is a shield and buckler to the "representative" who really at heart represents the people. A good representative is glad to have any bill which he passes referred to the people, and he is glad to have the people initiate any bill which they really desire.

WHAT IS THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM?

THE INITIATIVE.

In its ordinary meaning it is this: The initiative means the right of the people, under forms prescribed by law, to initiate any law they want and to whch they can get a sufficient number of thousands of citizens to attach their signatures on petitions, to be submitted by the secretary of state at the next regular election to the voters of the State for their adoption or rejection. It is very troublesome to get up an initiated petition. It is expensive. It is only done by those who are moved by a powerful interest and who believe that their proposal would meet the approval of the majority of the citizens of the State. The initiative permits a certain number of thousands of voters to make a motion before all of the citizens of the State, which shall be voted on, just as one man in a mass meeting can make a motion and have it voted on, or as one member of a legislative assembly can make a motion that a certain bill which he drafts shall be voted on. But the initiative by the people before it can be moved must have thousands of people say that they want it voted on by signing a petition to that effect. It takes over 18,000 voters in Oklahoma to initiate a bill. It gives the people an opportunity to pass any law they do want in this way when their legislature for any reason—particularly for the reason that the legislature is controlled by a crooked bipartisan political machine—refuses to pass laws which are of fundamental importance, such as a thoroughgoing corrupt practices prevention act. Oregon could never get a corrupt practices prevention act that was efficient until Oregon had the initiative and referendum, because the organized rascality of that State was in control of the legislature and would not permit it to be done. They could not get a proper direct primary nor other needed statutes.

THE REFERENDUM.

It is merely this: That the people, within 90 days after an objectionable act is passed, may in like manner sign a petition by a certain number of thousands of voters requesting that the particular objectionable act passed by the legislature which the petitioners believe injurious to the people shall be suspended in its operation until the next regular election, at which time the people shall have the right either to confirm or reject such statute so passed by the legislature. Usually 8 per cent of the voters can initiate a bill they want, and 5 per cent of the voters can have a referendum. A better system would be to require a fixed number of qualified voters, as 10,000, or 15,000, or 30,000, as in Maine. This fixes a definite standard and more clearly visualizes to the public the size and dignity of the demand for a proposed measure before it can be submitted to the whole people.

THE INITIATIVE AND THE REFERENDUM AND THE MACHINE.

The initiative and referendum, as I have said, is a deadly enemy to the machine. The machine can only retain its power power by preventing the passage of a corrupt practices prevention act, by preventing honest election laws, and preventing the establishing of honest election machinery. The organized rascality of the machine will always be found in the way of a thorough-going corrupt practices prevention act and will always be found opposed to perfecting the election machinery.

This is why in New York the bipartisan machine, led by machine politicians on the Democratic side, and by machine politicians on the Republican side, defeated a primary law. This is why proper laws controlling corrupt practices and perfecting the election machinery so as to make it absolutely honest have not been passed in New York, in Pennsylvania, and in numerous other States, and this is why the people of California adopted the initiative and referendum and the recall; this is why Oregon adopted it; this is why Oklahoma adopted it, and this is why so large a number of States have adopted the initiative and referendum, and why so many others are about to adopt it, and this is the reason why it is going to be adopted in every single one of the 48 States of this Union.

And no amount of political sophistry is going to stop the American people from adopting the means by progressive measures for putting an end to organized misconduct in the governing business in the United States.

The American people know what the trouble is, and the great English ambassador, James Bryce, in the American Commonwealth, photographed it for their information under the headings "The machine," "Rings and bosses," "Spoils, etc.," in 1888. (American Commonwealth, Vol. II, pp. 51–141, ed. 1888.) Public opinion has not been hasty, but has moved slowly, very slowly, too slowly.

Why, Mr. President, even the control of corrupt practices in the nomination and election of the President of the United States and in electing Senators and Members of Congress has never been properly passed. The law on the publicity of campaign contributions, the law which we have passed, is grossly defective, requiring no publicity of certain individual contributions, no publicity of any committee spending money wholesale on national elections, except where that committee is confessedly in charge of two or more States, and there is no machinery for making effective publicity of campaign contributions. The reason is that the power of the machine has been so great in the House and in the Senate that the perfecting of this law has appeared to be impossible. The American people are going to end it by putting their hands on the governing business with power and with direct authority through the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. These statutes open the door for the passage of corrupt practices prevention acts and for the recalling of unfaithful representatives.

By the initiative and referendum we can pass the Australian ballot, which being a secret ballot prevents the financial and commercial bullies of the country coercing the suffrage of the poor citizens whose bread and butter these bullies control.

By the initiative and referendum we can pass a mandatory primary law in spite of the legislature controlled by the machine, and in this way can permit the citizens to nominate their proposed representatives and take the nomination of public officials out of the hands of the convention system, out of the machine, out of the hands of organized rascality.

By the initiative and referendum we can pass a thoroughgoing corrupt practices prevention act that will destroy machine politics and corrupt practices in this Republic, and will drive out of public life machine-picked candidates, who are the allies and often the agents of monopoly and of the corrupt commercial and financial interests, who have not hesitated to use money on a gigantic scale. We have had in recent years overwhelming evidence of this.

By the initiative and referendum a new era of pure and upright government will be introduced into the United States and into the States of the Union in which the welfare of men, of women, and poor children will be the great motive force of law making and of law executing, and an end will be put to the use of legislative and executive power for the purpose of promoting merely the financial and commercial power of organized greed.

By the initiative and referendum we can promote organized righteousness in government and overthrow organized corruption.

By the initiative and referendum we can overthrow the corrupt convention system and establish the rule of the intelligence and conscience of the majority of our citizens.

By the initiative and referendum we can overthrow organized selfishness and establish organized altruism.

By the initiative and referendum we can overthrow the liquor traffic in the United States and establish sobriety and temperance and providence in this Republic.

By the initiative and referendum we can overthrow the Patent Medicine Trust and establish a department of health that will save hundreds of thousands of citizens annually from preventable diseases and death.

By the initiative and referendum we can establish the rights of the weak, of poor feeble men, of women, and of children who can not stand up against the grinding conditions established in this Republic and brought about by the combination of machine politics and organized corrupt selfishness.

It is no wonder that 4,000,000 voters broke away from all party ties and followed Theodore Roosevelt when he threw himself at the head of this vital demand for righteousness and efficiency in government. It is no wonder that Woodrow Wilson, having for years questioned the practicability of the initiative and referendum, changed his mind about it and threw himself on the right side of this vital question and is now a great exponent of this doctrine and the head of a party which thoroughly believes in it.

This noble doctrine of the democracy has won over millions of good citizens heretofore affiliated with other parties and led directly to the organization of the Progressive Party, so called.

The Democratic Party has long been the more progressive party of the Nation, even if it has had its efficiency impaired by corrupt machine politics in some of the States. It has been demanding the direct election of Senators for many years. It has violently opposed the corrupt use of money and the coercion of voters by commercial and financial interests, and has been opposing the trusts for many, many years. The Democratic Party declared itself boldly and strongly in favor of "direct legislation" in its platform of 1900 in the following language:

We favor direct legislation wherever practicable.

This means the initiative and referendum. And in its great platform of 1908 was the following noble declaration of progressive principles:

We rejoice at the increasing signs of an awakening throughout the country. The various investigations have traced graft and political corruption to the representatives of predatory wealth, and laid bare the unscrupulous methods by which they have debauched elections and preyed upon a defenseless public through the subservient officials whom they have raised to place and power.

The conscience of the Nation is now aroused and will free the Government from the grip of those who have made it a business asset of the favor-seeking corporations. It must become again a people's Government, and be administered in all departments according to the Jeffersonian maxim—"equal rights to all; special privileges to none."

"Shall the people rule?" is the overwhelming issue which manifests itself in all the questions now under discussion.
